Dear Sir/Madam,

I am writing to express my support for wind farms in rural Australia. Climate change is an international issue which requires action from every country. Australia's reluctance to do so is a source of embarrassment for its citizens. Wind energy is an internationally established technology with a minimal geographical footprint, minimal water use, and free, renewable fuel.

I understand that a few members of the community are upset by the proximity of wind farms to their houses. However, I also understand that there are many other people with wind farms on their land who benefit financially and do not experience any health issues. Clearly what needs to be investigated here is the community consultation and education.

A move towards clean energy is inevitable and this industry shouldn't be harmed by conservative attitudes and fear.

Thanks and kind regards,
Janene Webb
