I do not think this is right to ask dentists to refund Medicare money once they did their work but they neglected their paper work obligations.

In real live essence counts ,not pretentious papers, I understand that they are important to Medicare in order to differentiate what is fraud what is not, because more entities involved easier to trace potentially purloined money.

But for God sake punishment for not compliance goes beyond the limits of normality . This is like almost killing a fly and being responsible for killing the human.

This is far beyond comprehension and definitely this is not Australian way.

Too much focused what is bad ,nothing about what's good . Medicare seems to be not interested in the patients at all.

Now when patients come to the dentist, the last one is confused who is the most important here.....patient or Medicare?

I think it looks like Medicare and it is in my opinion incongruous ,therefore the whole scheme should be closed because nefarious from the day one of its existence.

It comes almost ,that is better not to participate in the scheme because if one does "witch hound"from Medicare is eminent and there will be always some paperwork found incorrect.

This also will be due to our computers softwares which do not accept prefix 85 before ADA codes so the whole load needs to be done manually, so even more open room for mistakes.

In summary dentists who committed fraud should be punished like with any other insurance but those who made paper

The whole matter should look more realistically and all parties participating be happy and then it will be Australian way at this point something is terribly wrong..
