Submission to the Senate Economics Legislation Committee

Inquiry into the Competition and Consumer
Amendment (Misuse of Market Power) Bill 2014

Submitted By: Lou Jardin

SPAR Australia Limited

Summary of SPAR Submission

- SPAR Australia, believes the Competition and Consumer Amendment (Misuse of Market Power) Bill 2014 is a positive development but in the absence of reform to Section 46 of the Competition and Consumer Act 2010, will not address continuing market abuse problems.
- There has only been eleven successful prosecutions out of eighteen under section 46 of the Competition and Consumer Act (previously the Trade Practices Act) in 38 years up until 2012. (See Appendix A). This demonstrates the total failure of section 46 to prevent market abuse.
- SPAR has firsthand experience of market abuse and the failure of the current legislative and regulatory framework to be able to address it.
- Market abuse continues in the wholesale independent grocery market dominated by Metcash.
- Despite the 2008 ACCC inquiry into the retail grocery sector, nothing has changed.
- SPAR welcomes the Abbott Governments current inquiry into the Competition and Consumer Act 2010.
- In the absence of reform of section 46 of the Competition and Consumer Act 2010, market abuse will essentially continue unchecked.
- SPAR would be happy to appear as a witness before the Senate Committee.

Introduction

SPAR welcomes the opportunity to provide a submission to the Senate Economics Legislation Committee in regards to the above private members Bill.

The issue of misuse of market power is one that SPAR has first-hand experience off in terms of suffering commercially from market power abuse and seeing first-hand the total incapacity of the current legislative and regulatory framework to address it.

It is interesting to note that since the 2008 Grocery Inquiry conducted by the ACCC and its examination of the retail grocery market and the power of the two supermarket chains Coles and Woolworths and the power of Metcash as a wholesale provider to the independent sector, not much if anything has changed.

Coles and Woolworths continue to dominate the retail sector and Metcash continues to dominate the wholesale independent sector, with the ultimate loser being the Australian consumer with small independent family owned business being collateral damage along the way.

Background - Who is SPAR?

SPAR is a broad based wholesaler and the only competitor to Metcash in the supply of packaged grocery products to the independent supermarket sector. As such SPAR seeks to provide a competitive force to Metcash in the market for packaged grocery products but is facing increasing anti-competitive behaviour that if successful and unchecked, will even further limit choice for the independent supermarket retail sector which will ultimately be to the detriment of consumers, particularly in rural and regional Australia.

Currently SPAR supply around 400 independent retailers, predominately located in Queensland, New South Wales and the ACT and mostly in rural and regional centres.

It is because of this that SPAR believes that legislative proposals such as the Competition and Consumer Amendment (Misuse of Market Power) Bill 2014 which seeks to give more judicial remedies for breaches of Section 46 of the Competition and Consumer Act is welcomed, but believes the failure lies with Section 46 itself as will be apparent later in this submission.

As Senator Xenophon said in his second reading speech, “The need for measures in this Bill is painfully obvious (6/3/14)”. SPAR could not agree more and while motivation for this Bill is the dominance of the major chains, SPAR would argue that similar problems exist in the wholesale market dominated by Metcash in regards to controlling the wholesale supply of goods to the independent supermarket sector.

What is a typical SPAR Franchise?

A classic small business with most SPAR franchises employing less than 20 staff.

The key distinguishing attributes of a SPAR franchise are:

- Most SPAR store owners are single store operators.
- Most are NSW and Queensland country/rural based.
- In some cases these stores would be the only supermarket in the town.
- In some cases these stores are the largest business and employer in the town.

The Role of the Small Business Independent Supermarket Retailer and the issues they face:

The Market in which they operate

The market in packaged goods is dominated by Coles and Woolworths.

Anecdotally they have an approximate 77% market share, with Metcash and the independents accounting for about 18%.

The remainder is made up of the international players ALDI and Costco which are growing strongly but are not widely represented.

Both are relatively new entrants, but importantly, both have zero presence in rural and regional Australia and are unlikely to do so as their business models only support serving large population centres in order to drive profit through large volume through put. As such rural and regional Australia in particular will continue to see less competition even with the entry of new players such as ALDI and Costco.

The wholesale market is therefore dominated by Metcash with a 98% market share and SPAR and others 2% in the market to supply the independent retail supermarket sector.

Even with just 2% market share it is becoming clear to SPAR that Metcash will do whatever it can to stifle SPAR's growth.

SPARs interest in this Bill is that SPAR sees it as a positive but incremental step, but potentially ineffectual as the real issue lies with a failure of Section 46 of the Act both in terms of ACCC enforcement and the tests applied by the Court to find market abuse has occurred.

Key Issues faced by the Small Business Supermarket Retailer

Small business as a whole is one of the biggest employers and wealth creators in Australia.

However, in the retail sector they are becoming increasingly extinct, with anti-competitive, market abuse behaviour a key driver of their extinction.

Of those remaining small businesses, they provide a valuable service, employ thousands of people in the towns and rural areas in which they operate, but face continual threats to their very survival with Government and regulators seemingly unable or unwilling to prevent both the march of increasing market concentration and stamp out market power abuse.

The 2008 ACCC Grocery Inquiry

In the context of this Bill it is worth revisiting some findings from the 2008 ACCC Grocery Report Inquiry as it helps to highlight as was mentioned previously that nothing has really changed since this report came down nearly six years ago. Hence small business needs as much assistance as it can get and SPAR sees this Bill as a move in the right direction, but not necessarily tackling the crux of the problem.

The report found in regards to Metcash in particular that:

- Independent supermarkets provide a competitive force in grocery retailing often providing consumers with a more convenient alternative to the major supermarket chains (MSCs)
- There are a reasonable number of independent supermarkets that have the size and location that should give them the ability to compete strongly with Coles and Woolworths on price. Indeed, some independent supermarkets do compete on price. However, the ACCC considers that the prices Metcash sets for its wholesale packaged groceries are a significant factor holding back many independent retailers from more aggressive price competition. (SPAR emphasis)
- Large independents which do opt to compete on price with the MSCs are often only able to do so by earning little net margin on goods supplied by Metcash.
- The inability of independent retailers to source grocery products from Metcash at competitive prices makes it difficult for large independent retailers to compete aggressively on price.
- Metcash is able to achieve healthy margins primarily because it is the only national wholesaler to independent retailers. There is some evidence that Metcash is acting to protect this position by locking in retailers and suppliers. However, it is clear that Metcash has expanded its profit margins and now achieves in excess of those achieved by the MSCs.
- The ACCC considers that Metcash is extracting some 'monopoly' profits because of the lack of alternative wholesaling arrangements available to most independent retailers. The size of these 'monopoly' profits is likely to be a small percentage of retail prices. However, given that grocery retailing is a high turnover business with low EBIT margins, this is significant. Moreover, there is some evidence that Metcash is acting to protect its business as the only national grocery wholesaler supplying independent retailers. Metcash is implementing strategies that appear to unnecessarily impede independent retailers from dealing directly with suppliers or leaving Metcash to set up their own wholesaling operations.

Competition and Consumer Amendment (Misuse of Market Power) Bill 2014

The purpose of the Bill is to give added power to the Court upon application by the ACCC or any other person where a corporation has been found to have contravened subsections 46(1) through divestiture where there has been a contravention of the Act.

While providing the Court with greater power to order a corporation to reduce its market share is welcome, the issue that SPAR has is that the ACCCs success in regards to prosecuting cases under section 46 have been few and far between. . (Please see Appendix A which includes an article from the Journal of Chartered Secretaries April 2012 which discusses the ACCCs success in prosecutions under section 46).

Failure of Section 46 of the Competition and Consumer Act 2010

While the article claims that the ACCC has had more success than the community would believe the actual facts up until 2012 show that between 1974 and 2012 the ACCC has only prosecuted a total of 18 cases alleging a breach of section 46. So that is 18 cases in 38 years.

To the casual observer how can this be considered a success?

In those 18 cases, the ACCC was successful in 11. So 11 successful cases under section 46 in 38 years, so once again to the casual observer how is this considered to be a success?

The key point SPAR would make is that while giving the Court added power is a good thing, it would appear to be potentially meaningless given the enforcement actions taken by the ACCC under section 46 have been minimal.

As the article in Appendix A states:

“The real issue in relation to s 46 is not that the ACCC regularly loses such cases (which is not borne out by the numbers), but rather that it simply does not take enough s 46 cases. In the 38 years since s 46 was enacted, the ACCC (and the TPC before it) only commenced 18 cases which alleged a contravention of s 46, or only one s 46 case every two years. The ACCC should be much more active in investigating and litigating s 46 allegations - only by taking such cases will the law in relation to s 46 be clarified.”

SPAR would suggest to the committee that either the law is deficient in regards to section 46, or the ACCC is deficient in not seeking to litigate more cases under 46.

SPAR notes that the Dawson Inquiry from 2003 recommended no change in regards to section 46. It is therefore encouraging the current Abbott Government has commenced a Competition Policy Review which includes a review of section 46.

The Government has tasked the Competition Policy Review with the following question:

“Given structural changes in the economy over time, how should misuse of market power be dealt with under the CCA?” (P29 Competition Policy Review Issues Paper).

This is an important question and the community now has another ten years of business behaviour to examine, particularly the behaviour of the major supermarket chains and Metcash in which to address this question.

Suggested improvements to the Bill

SPAR does not make any specific recommendation in regards to this Bill other than to welcome its intent to give the Courts more remedies to deal with breaches of section 46.

SPAR would encourage that the committee in its deliberation and recommendations to consider the issue of the failure of section 46 to prevent ongoing market abuse practices in the Australian market place.

A revamped section 46 with the powers this Bill seeks to introduce could well be a very strong deterrent to those that wish to engage in market abuse behaviour.

SPARs only concern is this Bill in isolation from changes to section 46 will not change the behaviour of those that seek to engage in market abuse behaviour.

Eleven successful cases under section 46 in 38 years, SPAR believes provides prove of that.

APPENDIX A

ACCC's record on section 46 cases

(This article first appeared in Keeping good companies, the Journal of Chartered Secretaries Australia Ltd, April 2012, Volume 63 No. 3, pp. 158-161. – reproduced in full)

The ACCC has been more successful in winning s 46 cases than is generally thought. The popular view is that the ACCC rarely wins such cases. This view has been given considerable credence by comments made by the ACCC, for example the following statements made by former ACCC Chairman Graeme Samuel in 2010:

The tests involved in proving allegations of abuse of market power have been inconsistently interpreted in the courts over recent years. As a consequence, it has become unrealistically difficult to overcome the hurdles necessary to prove contraventions of the law – resulting in few successful cases.

This sentiment has also been echoed more recently by the current Chairman of the ACCC, Rod Sims:

Further, over the years only a handful of cases under section 46 have succeeded in court. Indeed, section 46 cases are always hard fought, as major companies are necessarily involved, and they are usually defending what they may see as a key part of their business strategy.

The guidance to be derived from case law – at least in successful cases – is relatively modest.

So, the ACCC finds itself in the middle, with high public expectations on one side and high legal standards and few successful cases on the other.

However, in reality the ACCC has won more than 70% of the s 46 cases which it litigated to a conclusion:

Since the introduction of s 46 in 1974, the ACCC, and its predecessor the TPC, has instituted 18 cases alleging a contravention of s 46. Of these 18 cases, the ACCC:

- achieved successful outcomes in 11; lost four, dropped the market power allegation in one case, effectively drew one case and is awaiting judgment in the final case.

The ACCC has won 11 of the 15 s 46 cases which have gone to a final decision, a success rate of 73%. Further, the ACCC has resolved 8 of its 11 successful cases by consent, which would suggest that the ACCC is very good at “picking winners”.

Conclusions

The real issue in relation to s 46 is not that the ACCC regularly loses such cases (which is not borne out by the numbers), but rather that it simply does not take enough s 46 cases. In the 38 years since s 46 was enacted, the ACCC (and the TPC before it) only commenced 18 cases which alleged a contravention of s 46, or only one s 46 case every two years. The ACCC should be much more active in investigating and litigating s 46 allegations - only by taking such cases will the law in relation to s 46 be clarified.

In this regard, the comments of the current ACCC Chairman, Rod Sims, soon after he took up his position, are welcomed:

The ACCC now believes that it is time to resolve the unanswered questions surrounding section 46. Recent amendments to the Act and likely future court actions are providing guidance on how to successfully prosecute companies that misuse their market power. However, the ACCC must also make sure that when it does come across a promising s 46 case that it does not sell the case short by settling the case for an insignificant penalty.

Parliament's decision to amend s 76 of CCA to introduce vastly increased penalties from 1 January 2007 for anti-competitive conduct should have made it abundantly clear to both the ACCC and the Federal Court that Parliament expects such conduct to be punished much more severely than it has in the past. Unfortunately, the size of the penalty in the Ticketek case is quite out of step with Parliament's intent – namely, to get serious about punishing anti-competitive conduct.
