

To whom it may concern

As an Australian citizen, when I heard about the proposed capping bill, I feel I have to express my disappointment to this bill. First of all, the onshore skilled migrant applicants are tressures of the country, not rubbish. I know lots of them, they are well educated, working hard and having made great contributions to Australia economics and communities. They love Australia and have looked here as home even they have not obtained permanent residency. Secondly, if this bill passes, Australia's good reputation at international education market will collapse, consequently, the education industry of our country follows, and that is the third industry of our country. Finally, I am very concern that in this proposed bill, there will be no limitations for the minister to cap visa applications. This is very danger to the Australian law system. With this bill, the Australian migration laws becomes no use at all, the minister can even cap every applicants by his personal favour. Considering these consequences, I hope the bill won't pass.
