

To whom it may concern,

The Coal-Fired Power Funding Prohibition Bill represents a clear and much needed step towards mitigating the coming climate disaster. While I understand that such a bill will notably impact those who work within the coal industry, its continued existence is an existential threat to the safety of not only our nation, but those of our neighbours. Coal is an archaic and inefficient form of energy production that has been kept economically viable due to our government's refusal to embrace greener alternatives. By banning coal fired power funding we are taking a necessary, and urgently needed, step towards a greener future. To not do so is to embrace a future of famine, natural disasters, and migration crises. Given that I, and most of my fellow Australians, would like to avoid living in a Mad Max style dystopia, I hope that those tasked with governing our people would see the benefits of embracing this bill.

Thanks,
Zac Greenwood
