

From:
Ms Catherine Millar

This league of tables being generated on the internet is not achieving a best result for all concerned.

In theory it sounds positive but in reality it has been negative. For a government to promote such damaging information is sueable and class action will be brought against the continuance of such tables.

This government would be better to utilise resources in combatting truancy, special education for special needs children and parenting courses for those parents who have no idea how to parent. Families are fractured and the results of testing children from these situations and publishing such is nefarious results at best is abhorrent. Trying taking a test when the previous night a student has witnessed violence in the home and has been subjected to it. These students are not interested in the NAPLAN. It is not going to make on iota of a difference to their situation. This can be replicated over and over again. Teachers can teach to the test and students sit get great results but if sat again in another term the student will have forgotten it.

Wake up and look closely at what this has not achieved nor will it achieve better results, better students, happy parents, better staff, better principals nor a better education system. You are condemning us all.

Even those who are supposedly rank as the best in the country are privately run schools with money and resources. Children from well bred backgrounds meaning that the IQ status of students is far superior therefore rewarding them on these tables is a joke. Stick them all in the worst schools and the results would be different. How can one take any credence from the ad hoc way this information is being disseminated to create something that is false.

It all comes down to money and funding. Take away the funding from the top schools and place the money in the lower socio-economic schools. Then swap the teachers out of these top schools and place them in the lower socio-economic schools see what happens if anything changes for the better, otherwise all this is for nothing and the time money wasted to create it.

The information is useless as the basis of doing it in the first place is flawed.