

I am totally devastated by the stance of Conroy and Labor in there dealings with Telstra.

We were sold shares in a company and being touted that we were supporting Australia by doing so.

I have virtually all my super in Telstra but I am so incensed by the governments stance that I'm prepared to lose the lot and have informed the company to fight the government all the way with my full support even if its going to affect the value of the company.

And I have been a labour supporter most of my life [not any more] so I can only guess at the feelings of others who have voted differently in the past. It's easy for Conroy to make a name for himself at others expense I bet it would be different if it was his money at stake.

It could be his job at stake as Telstra shareholders do vote.

If the NBN goes ahead, shafting Telstra in the process I will not be using it even if I have to go with an overseas owned company where the profits will be going offshore.
