My submission will be short — but not sweet!

I have been living in torment for the past 45 years, & not a day goes by when I don't think of my daughter who was taken away from me all those years ago. I only hope her life was a lot happier than mine, without her.

At the hospital the social worker kept insisting that it was for the good of the baby that it goes to a home with both parents, & that I wouldn't be able to cope on my own.

After my daughter was born the very next day the nurse gave me some "Bromet" (a drug a chemist told me was given to soldiers in the war & also inmates to quell their emotions.) So needless to say when it came to sign the adoption paper I was like putty in their hands & signed on the seventh day.

Then they allowed me to see my baby through a glass window — (NO CUDDLING ALLOWED) I remember not feeling anything until later when I was discharged with a few stilboestrol tablets to dry up my milk.

I'm sure my life would have been a lot different, had I been informed & given a CHOICE by the social worker. Who even had the gall to write (not a pretty baby) about my daughter in her file!

Hoping justice prevails

P.S.

For me it was an emotional horror story & STILL IS!

Yours Sincerely,
