Re: Council of Europe Convention on the Manipulation of Sports Competitions

The 'wagerisation' of Australian community football

A submission by Jack Kerr

I am an investigative journalist who has been researching the sports data supply chain for close to a decade, and have won national and international awards for my reporting on this and related issues for the likes of The New York Times, The Age and Sydney Morning Herald, the ABC and Bellingcat. I write on behalf of my colleagues Philippe Auclair, Samindra Kunti and Stephen Menary, with whom I have worked on numerous investigations in this space.

The 'wagerisation' of Australia community football should be of high concern to the Committee.

Article 9 of the Macolin Convention calls for the prohibition of betting on low-level competitions - or as it describes them, competitions whose "organisational conditions and/or stakes in sporting terms are inadequate".

Our auditing of the global soccer betting market has repeatedly found that Australian competitions of this nature are the primary fodder for many offshore bookmakers.

During an audit undertaken for The Age in 2021, for example, one Russian betting site was found to offer in-play betting on close to 300 games of Australian soccer in a single weekend (see Appendix for a list of these games.)

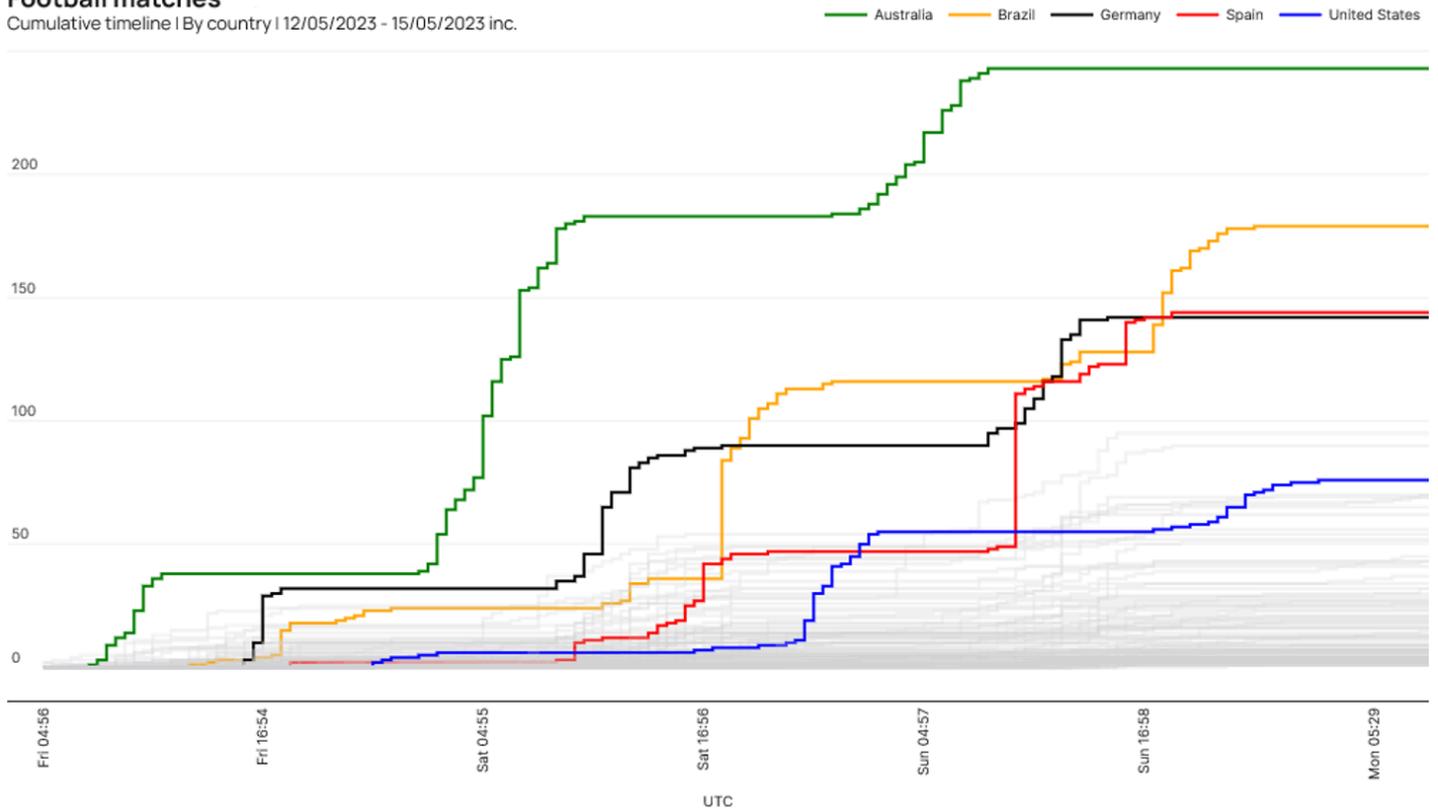

In a more recent audit, from April this year, in-play betting on games from 60 different Australian leagues was offered by a different Russian bookmaker in a single weekend.

When the Australian soccer season is in action, no other country comes close to matching us for games available for in-play betting on the offshore betting market, as the following graph makes clear. It charts the number of games per country, as found being offered by yet another Russian bookmaker, and gives perspective on how out-of-control the situation is. With in-play betting available on 242 games, Australia was well ahead of even Brazil, Germany and Spain. No other country tallied more than 100 games.

Needless to say, almost all of these games are semi-professional or amateur (only a single A-League Men's game happened that weekend). This means almost 500 community teams from Australia were placed on the offshore betting market - and so thousands of Australians, many of them paying to play, had their hobby monetised by an industry riddled with links to organised crime, scam compounds and the Russian war machine.

Football matches

Cumulative timeline | By country | 12/05/2023 - 15/05/2023 inc.

Many of the games would have more players than spectators, and can have up to six "data scouts" in attendance. Data scouts are employed by international sports data companies to collect live data from venues, which is then distributed to bookmakers around the world. Many of these data providers also have "integrity services" deals with sports governing bodies, an obvious conflict of interest. At least one has an agreement in place with Australian police.

During our research, we discovered one mid-week competition from the Gold Coast involving players aged over 60 that was on the offshore market. Players of this age were able to play because the competition had unlimited substitutions, which indicates how low-level this competition is. Nevertheless, with the encouragement of its football federation, a data rights deal with one of these sports data companies had been entered into. This is part of the reason that the Gold Coast can produce more games for the betting market over a weekend than all of mainland China.

But in many cases, teams seem to have no idea they are being placed on the betting market. In one match I attended, the game was so low-level that the players on one team had never run out a full-match and I could walk my dog across the pitch at half-time. Nevertheless, there was a data scout there.

The A-League is suffering from repeated betting scandals, and games at the lower level may be more vulnerable to integrity issues (and even the data companies acknowledge this). But unlike the A-League, there is almost no onshore betting market for these lower-tier games. Indeed, the key market for these games seems to be bookmakers operating from jurisdictions where there is limited regulation and oversight (beyond the payment of a 'license' fee). Any suspicious bets placed on these matches will be almost exclusively beyond the intelligence-sharing arrangements that Football Australia and its state counterparts might have in place.

I suspect this issue must stem from the permissive attitude of the Australian soccer bodies, which are told by the data industry that the only way to protect their games from match-fixing is to let them be placed on the betting market - or else nefarious actors will. It is a bizarre argument, and not supported by results from countries like France, which takes a far more restrictive view to sports gambling. Likewise, many states in Germany recently took steps to prevent live data on their lower-level matches being sold, and this appears to have solved many of the issues it was having with regional and neighbourhood games being placed on the betting market.

The Australian government should honour its commitment to the Macolin Convention and do likewise.

Recommendations

In order to protect the integrity of sporting results, we would therefore make the following recommendations:

1. Sports data companies and bookmakers should be prevented from collecting, distributing or using data from sporting events that meet any of the following:
 - are amateur;
 - are semi-professional;
 - typically sell fewer than 1000 tickets;
 - involve minors;
 - are not officially authorised.
2. Sports, clubs and local councils should be empowered to take proactive steps to prevent games of this nature from being placed on the betting market, including by not authorising the collection of data on these matches and not allowing entry to data scouts.
3. Sports data companies operating in Australia or with agreements with Australian organisations should be required to publish real time lists of all games they collect data on and all clients who can access that data.
4. Sports data companies should be prevented from selling data on Australian sports to bookmakers that meet any of the following:
 - a. operate with a licence that does not allow them to service people in that licensee country;

- b. operate in a jurisdiction that does not have actual and appropriate AML and suspicious match reporting laws and oversights in place;
- c. use redirects and mirror sites, which is generally an indication of it being an illegitimate operation;¹
- d. do not publish in real-time their data source for each match.

¹ with some exceptions for .com sites that redirect to specific jurisdiction sites like .com.au.

Appendix

In just 72 hours, these 294 games of Australian soccer were available for in-play betting with a Russian bookmaker during an audit in 2021.
