I consider it totally unfair to list\compare schools of high second language, low socio economic students along side high socio economic english speaking schools. The results do not indicate to the public this differentiation. The public is misled and teachers in these settings are portrayed as failures. I believe schools are resorting to cover ups to produce higher quality results and this type of behaviour is setting school against school. Is this what we want our education system to become? I could go on forever but unfortunately my time is limited, I have to test students in order to test them for a test.
