Alter rules relating to farm management deposits (FMD) to increase the allowable amounts held in FMD, as well as the uses to which those funds can be applied.

The Australian Honey Bee Industry Council Inc. is in favour of increasing the allowable limits to be held in Farm Management Deposits (FMD). This is seen as a prudent measure to allow beekeepers to be able to make sure they are financially viable for the future. It also allows them to equalize the variations in seasons and to be able to increase the amounts would be helpful for them.

I note in the summary it also says “enable certain primary producers experiencing severe drought conditions to withdraw an amount that has been held in an FMD for less than 12 months”. As primary producers, beekeepers are also subject to drought when there are no flowers on trees for the bees to work.

Another area that has come to light in recent times is the disastrous fires in Tasmania where some beekeepers will experience extreme financial hardship for the next year and, for some, for several years to come. This would be an example where prudent beekeepers, who have put money away in a FMD, could be allowed to access their money which has been held for less than 12 months.
