

It may currently be possible to adapt to the climate change. However, the increased severity of heat waves, sea level rises and consequences of these features may well be much more difficult to adapt to in the future. This may be the situation for the coming generations of people who have no voice in the present discussion. It is thus our moral duty to mitigate against increasing global warming rather than just adapt to the level that is now experienced. I am of the opinion that mitigation is much more important than adaptation when it comes to climate change.

Gösta Lyngå