Chapter 1

Introduction

1.1 On 15 November 2018, the Senate referred the provisions of the Migration Amendment (Strengthening the Character Test) Bill 2018 (the bill) to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Legislation Committee (the committee) for inquiry and report by 18 January 2019.¹

Conduct of this inquiry

1.2 Details of the inquiry were advertised on the committee's website, and the committee directly invited a range of organisations to make a written submission. The committee called for submissions to be received by 28 November 2018, but accepted some submissions after that date. In total, the committee accepted 15 submissions.

1.3 All submissions are listed at appendix 1 of this report and available at the committee's website.

1.4 The committee thanks all submitters for their involvement in this inquiry.

Structure of this report

1.5 This report consists of two chapters:

- This chapter provides a brief overview of the bill as well as the administrative details of the inquiry.
- Chapter 2 discusses the need for the bill, key issues raised in evidence to the inquiry, and provides the committee's view and recommendation.

Purpose of the bill

1.6 The stated purpose of the bill is to strengthen the current legislative framework regarding visa refusals and cancellations on character grounds.² The bill amends the Migration Act 1958 (the Act) to provide grounds for non-citizens who commit a serious offence and pose a risk to the safety of the Australian community, to be considered for their visa to be refused or cancelled.³

1.7 The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Multicultural Affairs, the Hon. Mr David Coleman MP (the Minister), introduced the bill into the House of Representatives on 25 October 2018. In introducing the bill, the Minister stated:

Australia is an accessible and attractive destination to visit, to do business and to live. We are a welcoming, multicultural, open and cohesive society. At the same time, we need to ensure that we remain safe and secure. The government will not tolerate criminal behaviour of noncitizens. Entry and stay in Australia by noncitizens is a privilege, not a right, and the Australian community expects that the Australian government can and should refuse entry to noncitizens, or cancel their visas, if they do not abide by the rule of law. Those who choose to break the law and fail to uphold the standards of behaviour expected by the Australian community should expect to lose that privilege.⁴

1.8 The Minister explained that the current character test, applied to visa applicants and holders, does not capture 'all those found guilty of serious criminality, including those who may not serve any custodial sentence and who may pose a continued risk to the safety of the community'.⁵ The bill would therefore address this gap by providing for discretionary cancellation or refusal, regardless of whether a custodial sentence is imposed or not.

1.9 In addition, the Minister suggested the measures in the bill would provide clarity and certainty for decision-makers when considering whether to refuse or cancel a visa:

Strengthening the character test in this way provides a clear and objective ground for which to consider the cancelling the visa of or refusing to grant a visa to a noncitizen who has been convicted of offences that involve violence against a person, including murder, manslaughter, kidnapping, assault, aggravated burglary and the threat of violence, non-consensual conduct of a sexual nature, using or possessing a weapon or breaching an order made by a court or tribunal for the personal protection of another person.⁶

Background

1.10 Section 501 of the Act concerns the refusal or cancellation of visas on character grounds, and has undergone significant change since 2014.

1.11 This section will outline the changes made to the character and visa cancellation provisions in 2014, the current provisions, and the context within which the proposed changes to the current provisions have been introduced.

Migration Amendment (Character and General Visa Cancellation) Bill 2014

1.12 The Migration Amendment (Character and General Visa Cancellation) Bill 2014 (the 2014 character bill) was introduced by the then Minister for Immigration and Border Protection, the Hon Scott Morrison MP, into the House of Representatives on the 24 September 2014. The purpose of the 2014 character bill, Mr Morrison explained, was:

4 The Hon. Mr David Coleman MP, Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Multicultural Affairs, House of Representatives Hansard, 25 October 2018, p. 1.

5 The Hon. Mr David Coleman MP, Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Multicultural Affairs, House of Representatives Hansard, 25 October 2018, p. 1.

6 The Hon. Mr David Coleman MP, Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Multicultural Affairs, House of Representatives Hansard, 25 October 2018, p. 1.

...to strengthen the character and general visa cancellation provisions in the Migration Act to ensure that non-citizens who commit crimes in Australia, pose a risk to the Australian community or represent an integrity concern are appropriately considered for visa refusal or cancellation. The bill also introduces a mandatory cancellation power for non-citizens who objectively do not pass the character test and are in prison.⁷

1.13 The 2014 character bill was introduced following a review in 2013 by the then Department of Immigration and Border Protection into the character and general visa cancellation framework. That review recommended that changes be made to the Act in order 'to strengthen the integrity of the migration programme, including amendments to better capture particular kinds of criminal activity and non-citizens who engage in migration fraud'.⁸

1.14 Prior to the introduction of this bill, the character and visa cancellation provisions of the Act had remained unchanged for some time:

The character provisions in Part 9 of the Migration Act have been in place in their current form since 1999, and the general visa cancellation provisions in Subdivision D of Division 3 of Part 2 of the Migration Act have remained largely unchanged since 1994. Since that time, the environment in relation to the entry and stay in Australia of non-citizens has changed dramatically, with higher numbers of temporary visa holders entering Australia for a variety of purposes.⁹

1.15 The 2014 character bill proposed three key amendments to the Act:

- Amending section 501 of the Act to:
 - broaden the existing grounds for not passing the character test; and
 - allow the minister to require the head of an agency of a state or territory to disclose to the minister personal information that is relevant to whether the person passes the character test, and the possible refusal or cancellation of their visa under section 501.
- Amending the general visa cancellation provisions in the Act to:
 - enhance measures for dealing with noncitizens who present an integrity, identity or fraud risk;
 - introduce lower thresholds for cancelling temporary visas, reflective of the lower tolerance for behavioural concerns in the temporary visa context; and 9 Migration Amendment (Character and General Visa Cancellation) Bill 2014 explanatory memorandum, p. 1.

- introduce stronger personal ministerial decision making powers in relation to the general visa cancellation provisions, consistent with those in the character provisions.
- Introducing mandatory visa cancellation under section 501 of the Act in certain circumstances.¹⁰

1.16 The 2014 character bill received Royal Assent on 10 December 2014.

Current character and general visa cancellation provisions

1.17 The current provisions of the Act enable the Minister to refuse to grant a visa if the visa applicant does not satisfy the Minister that they pass the character test.¹¹ Further, the Minister may cancel an existing visa if the Minister reasonably suspects that the visa holder does not pass the character test, and the visa holder does not satisfy the Minister that they pass the character test.¹²

1.18 A person may not pass the character test if any of the criteria contained in section 501(6) are satisfied, including:

- the person holds a substantial criminal record, as defined by section 501(7);¹³
- the person has been convicted of an offence committed while in immigration detention, escaping from immigration detention or after escaping immigration but before being placed in immigration detention again;¹⁴
- the person has committed an offence against section 197A of the Act;¹⁵
- a reasonable suspicion by the Minister that the person has been, is a member of or has an association with a group or organisation involved in criminal conduct;¹⁶
- a reasonable suspicion by the Minister that the person has been or is involved in certain conduct, including a people smuggling offence under sections 233A to 234A of the Act, people trafficking offences or crimes of international concern such as the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes or crimes involving torture or slavery;¹⁷

- a consideration that the person is not of good character, with regard to the person's past and present criminal and general conduct;¹⁸
 - a risk that the person's entry or continued presence in Australia would pose a risk to the community, including engaging in criminal conduct, harassing or molesting another person in Australia, or vilifying a segment of the Australian community;¹⁹ and
 - a person being convicted by a court (either in Australia or a foreign country) in relation to sexually based offences involving a child.²⁰

1.19 Further, the Minister must cancel a visa where the visa holder has been sentenced to a custodial sentence of 12 months' duration or more, or has been found guilty of a sexual crime involving a child.²¹

1.20 When the Minister or delegate considers refusing or cancelling a visa under section 501, the decision-maker should have regard to the 2014 Direction No. 65 – Visa refusal and cancellation under s501 and revocation of a mandatory cancellation of a visa under s501CA (Ministerial Direction No. 65, the Direction), which provides factors to be taken into account when making the decision and how they apply.²² The Direction divides such factors into 'primary' and 'other' considerations, and assists a decision-maker to make decisions according to these factors, giving more weight to 'primary' factors.²³

1.21 A visa applicant or holder who does not satisfy the character test and consequently has their visa refused or cancelled may appeal a refusal or cancellation within 28 days of the decision. Further applications to the Administrative Appeals Tribunal (AAT) or judicial review may be sought where a visa is not restored.²⁴

1.22 In 2016, the Commonwealth Ombudsman completed an own motion investigation into section 501 of the Act. As part of its report, the Commonwealth Ombudsman illustrated that the number of visas cancelled under section 501 had increased dramatically since the 2014 amendments to section 501 of the Act.

'No one teaches you to become an Australian'

1.24 The amendments proposed by the bill were developed in response to the report of the Joint Standing Committee on Migration's (JCSM), No one teaches you to become an Australian.²⁵ In his second reading speech, the Minister referred to this report, which 'noted that strengthening the character provisions will make Australians feel safer and be safer'.²⁶

1.25 In its report, the JCSM stated that:

The majority of submitters to this inquiry largely held the view that the current character and cancellation provisions in the Act were an adequate way of addressing non-citizens who have been involved in criminal activities.²⁷

1.26 However, the JCSM also noted that there exist 'community concerns about the escalation of violent crimes such as homicide, serious assault, rape, indecent assault, aggravated burglary, motor vehicle theft and rioting; particularly in Victoria', and expressed the view that 'such serious criminal offences committed by visa holders must have appropriate consequences'.²⁸

28 Joint Standing Committee on Migration, No one teaches you to become an Australian, December 2017, p. 174.

1.27 In considering the character and cancellation provisions of the Act, the JCSM acknowledged the 'concerns of submitters about extending the character provisions in the Migration Act 1958 to under 18 year olds', and that there are 'a lack of services to assist in the participation of young people from migrant and refugee backgrounds in mainstream Australian society'.²⁹ The JCSM also considered that a person aged over 16 whose visa is cancelled cannot be deported until that person reaches 18 years of age.³⁰

1.28 The JCSM ultimately made the following recommendations in respect of the character and cancellation provisions of the Act:

Recommendation 15

7.228 The Committee recommends that the Australian Government amend the Migration Act 1958 requiring the mandatory cancellation of visas for offenders aged between 16 and 18 years who have been convicted of a serious violent offence, such as car jacking's [sic] or serious assaults. If legislation is amended, this should be accompanied by a caveat that no retrospective liability is thereby created.

Recommendation 16

7.229 The Committee is also recommending that anyone over 18 years of age who has been convicted of a serious violent offence which is prescribed, such as serious assaults, aggravated burglary, sexual offences and possession of child pornography, have their visa cancelled under section 501 of the Migration Act 1958.³¹

1.29 The Department of Home Affairs has noted that, in response to these recommendations, the proposed amendments to the Act 'ensure all non-citizens convicted of serious offences may be considered for visa refusal or cancellation under section 501 of the Migration Act 1958'.³²

1.30 The JCSM is currently conducting an inquiry into review processes associated with visa cancellations made on criminal grounds, and at the time of tabling this report has not yet reported its findings.³³

Definitions of 'character concern' and 'designated offence'

1.32 The bill proposes to amend the meaning of 'character concern' contained in section 5C of the Act. Proposed paragraph 5C(1)(a) would clarify that a non-citizen who has been convicted of one of the offences set out in the Act would be of character concern.³⁴ It refers to offences contained in proposed subsection 5C(3) for the purposes of the definition of character concern.³⁵

1.33 Proposed paragraphs 5C(3)(a)-(c) introduce a new definition of 'designated offence'. They state that for the purposes of subsection 5C(1), a designated offence constitutes an offence against a law in force in Australia or a foreign country, which includes:

- one or more of the physical elements involves a number of specific acts, including (but not limited to): violence against a person, non-consensual conduct of a sexual nature, breaching an order made by a court or tribunal for the personal protection of another person, using or possessing a weapon, aiding or abetting the commission of an offence, and others;³⁶
- an offence punishable by: imprisonment for life, imprisonment for a fixed term of two years or more, or imprisonment for a maximum term of two years;³⁷ or
- an offence against the law in force in a foreign country punishable in a foreign country, if it were assumed that the act or omission constituting the offence had taken place in the Australian Capital Territory (ACT), and the act was against the law in the ACT and punishable as mentioned in paragraph 5C(3)(a).³⁸

Refusal or cancellation of visa on character grounds

1.34 The bill proposes to amend the application of the character test contained in section 501 of the Act to incorporate the definition of character concern by the proposed changes to section 5C. Currently, the Act provides that the character test contained in subsection 501(6) sets out the circumstances in which a non-citizen does not pass the character test.³⁹ Proposed paragraph 501(6)(aaa) would provide that a non-citizen does not pass the character test if the non-citizen is convicted of a designated offence as defined by proposed subsection 501(7AA).⁴⁰ The explanatory memorandum to the bill states that the intention of this item is 'to ensure that a non-citizen who has been convicted of a designated offence is included in a class of persons who do not pass the character test'.⁴¹

1.35 Proposed subsection 501(7AA) introduces the elements of a designated offence for the purposes of the character test in subsection 501(6) of the Act. Proposed subparagraphs 501(7AA)(a)(i)–(viii) replicate the factors set out in proposed paragraph 5C(3)(a).

Application of amendments

1.36 Proposed item 7(2) of the bill states that amendments made in proposed paragraph 501(6)(aaa) will apply to a decision to grant or refuse to grant a visa if the application for the visa was made prior to the commencement of the bill and had not been finally determined, or the application for the visa is made on or before the commencement of the amendments.⁴² It also applies to a decision made on or after the commencement to cancel a visa.⁴³

Consideration by other Parliamentary committees

1.37 This bill has been considered by both the Scrutiny of Bills Committee (the Scrutiny Committee) and the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights (PJCHR). This section contains a summary of these committees' reports on the bill.

Scrutiny of Bills Committee

1.38 The Scrutiny Committee drew attention to the bill's broad discretionary powers and whether there existed a trespass on personal rights and liberties.⁴⁴ It stated that the bill's explanation of the practical consequences of the amendments, namely that more people would be liable for consideration of refusal or cancellation of a visa due to the stricter character requirements, would 'result in more people being held in immigration detention, removed from Australia and potentially separated from their family'.⁴⁵

1.39 The Scrutiny Committee raised a number of other concerns, such as:

- the proposed amendment to refuse or cancel a person's visa where they have committed a designated offence but served a very short sentence or no sentence at all;⁴⁶
- the exclusion of natural justice requirements for decisions taken in regards to section 501 visa rejections or cancellations;⁴⁷ and

- questions regarding merits review and the capacity for the minister to overturn a decision made by the AAT.⁴⁸

1.40 The Scrutiny Committee concluded by stating that section 501 of the Act already provides the minister with considerable and broad discretionary power to refuse or cancel a visa, and does not contain procedural fairness obligations or adequate merits review. It therefore queried whether the bill unduly trespasses on rights and liberties, and suggested amending the test under the relevant section.

Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights

1.41 The PJCHR expressed a number of concerns with the bill. The PJCHR noted that it has previously considered the power of the minister to cancel or refuse a visa on character grounds in relation to the character bill which sought to amend section 501 of the Act.⁴⁹

1.42 The PJCHR stated that the proposed amendments may breach Australia's 'non-refoulement' obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. The report observed that the statement of compatibility with human rights in the bill's explanatory memorandum acknowledges that the removal of a person from Australia following the refusal or cancellation of a visa engages the non-refoulement obligation. The statement of compatibility also expressed Australia's commitment to its international obligations concerning non-refoulement, an obligation that is considered as part of the decision of whether to cancel or refuse a visa.

1.43 However, the PJCHR noted that section 197C of the Act states that, for the purposes of exercising removal powers, Australia's non-refoulement obligations are irrelevant in regards to an unlawful citizen, and:

Therefore, notwithstanding the commitment in the statement of compatibility not to remove a person in breach of non-refoulement obligations, there is no statutory protection available to ensure that an unlawful non-citizen to whom Australia owes protection obligations will not be removed from Australia.⁵⁰

1.44 The PJCHR further observed that there is no right to merits review of a decision that is made personally by the minister to refuse or cancel a person's visa on character grounds. It further stated that while judicial review of the minister's decision may be available, the PJCHR has previously found that 'judicial review in the

Australian context is not likely to be sufficient to fulfil the international standard required of "effective review" of non-refoulement decisions'.⁵¹

1.45 The PJCHR expressed concern on a number of other issues in relation to the bill, including:

- whether the bill is compatible with the right to liberty, with respect to potential arbitrary detention under international human rights law where a person may be subject to indefinite or prolonged detention due to being unable to return to their home country;⁵²
- whether the bill is compatible with the prohibition on expulsion without due process, including the availability of judicial review;⁵³
- whether the bill is compatible with the right to respect for the family and the obligation to consider the best interests of the child;⁵⁴
- whether the bill is compatible with the right to freedom of movement;⁵⁵ and
- powers to collect personal information based on 'character concern'.⁵⁶

1.46 The PJCHR sought advice from the minister on a number of matters in relation to these concerns. As at the time of tabling this report, the minister had not yet responded to the PJCHR's requests.

Chapter 2

The key issues

2.1 This chapter considers the need for the Migration Amendment (Strengthening the Character Test) Bill 2018 (the bill), and discusses a number of issues raised with the committee by submitters in respect to the proposed changes to the Migration Act 1958 (the Act).

2.2 The chapter concludes with the committee view and the committee's recommendation with respect to the bill.

The need for the bill

2.3 As set out in the Minister's second reading speech, the amendments to the existing character test at section 501 of the Act that would be made by the bill would strengthen 'the current legislative framework in relation to visa refusals and cancellations on character grounds'.¹

2.4 In referring to the stated purpose of the bill, some submitters suggested that the Minister already has expansive powers to refuse or cancel a visa on character grounds, and questioned whether the bill is justified or necessary.² For example, the Law Council of Australia (Law Council) stated that while it 'recognises that it is both necessary and appropriate to regulate people seeking to enter and remain in Australia by reference to questions of character', the need to expand the existing visa cancellation provisions 'has not been made sufficiently clear'.³

2.5 Similarly, the Asylum Seeker Resource Centre (ASRC) questioned the need for the bill, which it argued 'will offer no greater protection or safety to the Australian community beyond what is already provided for in existing law'.⁴

2.6 The New South Wales Council for Civil Liberties (NSWCCL) highlighted the existing powers of the Minister to refuse and cancel visas:

...under the existing act, persons can already be deemed to have failed the character test if they pose any risk to the community, on the basis of their criminal of general conduct, or due to an association they have.⁵

4 Asylum Seeker Resource Centre (ASRC), Submission 8, p. 1.

5 New South Wales Council for Civil Liberties (NSWCCL), Submission 2, p. 4.

2.7 The Visa Cancellations Working Group (Working Group) also submitted that adequate powers to cancel a visa already exist:

The Bill categorically does not enable the cancellation of the visas of any person for whom cancellation is not already available. It merely removes a decision maker's power to assess whether or not certain individuals meet or fail the character test, making failure mandatory in prescribed circumstances. This will make disproportionate and ill-informed decision-making that is out of step with community standards immensely more likely.⁶

2.8 However, the Department of Home Affairs (the Department) explained that the proposed amendments made by the bill:

...will ensure non-citizens who are convicted of certain serious offences—and pose an ongoing risk to the Australian community while in Australia or will pose a threat if they are allowed to enter Australia—do not pass the character test and are appropriately considered for visa refusal or cancellation.⁷

2.9 The bill would achieve this end by amending the character test at section 501 of the Act, providing delegates 'with a clear, objective ground with which to consider refusing or cancelling a non-citizen's [sic] visa' due to a conviction for one or more offences, such as:

- violence against a person;
- non-consensual conduct of a sexual nature;
- breaching an order made by a court or tribunal for the person[al] protection of another person — such as an apprehended violence order;
- using or possessing a weapon; or
- involvement in any of the above.⁸

2.10 The Department explained that, in determining whether to refuse or cancel a visa on character grounds, a delegate 'must consider a wide range of factors contained within binding Ministerial Direction 65', which includes:

- protection of the Australian community from criminal or other serious conduct;
- best interests of minors in Australia;
- expectations of the Australian community;
- Australia's international obligations;
- impact on victims; and

- the nature and extent of a person's ties to Australia.⁹

2.11 The Department provided three case studies which illustrate why these changes are necessary to protect the Australian community, including the following:

Mr C is an adult permanent visa holder in Australia who has links to youth gangs. Mr C was found guilty without conviction for theft related offences, for which he received a youth supervision order. He subsequently was also convicted of a violent offence and sentenced to a period of four months imprisonment. Mr C has not been sentenced to a term of imprisonment of 12 months or more and, under the current character provisions, does not objectively fail the character test on the basis of his criminal history.

Mr C's visa cannot be considered for cancellation under section 116(1)(e) of the Act on the basis that he may present a risk to the community, as this power does not apply to permanent visa holders who are in Australia.

Mr C will remain in Australia as the holder of a permanent visa, unless sufficient adverse information becomes available to find that Mr C does not pass the character test under subjective grounds.

However, under the proposed designated offences ground in the Migration Amendment (Strengthening the Character Test) Bill 2018, Mr C would objectively fail the character test as he has been convicted of a violent offence, which is punishable by imprisonment for a maximum term of five years.¹⁰

Groups affected by visa cancellations

2.12 The majority of submitters to the committee discussed the proposed changes in the bill with reference to the 2014 amendments to section 501 of the Act—discussed in chapter 1—and the effect of these amendments, and the anticipated effect of the proposed amendments, on particular groups. Some submitters also suggested that, contrary to the government's stated position,¹¹ the bill does not accord with community expectations.¹²

2.13 This section discusses the evidence received in respect of those groups most frequently identified by submitters as being potentially affected by the proposed amendments in the bill.

Children

2.14 A number of submitters expressed concern that the current visa cancellation provisions apply,¹³ and that the proposed amendments will also apply,¹⁴ to minors.

2.15 For example, the Refugee Council of Australia (Refugee Council) stated that the bill:

...lowers the bar for visa cancellations to such an extent that a child could be subject to indefinite detention or deportation for sharing an intimate image of their girlfriend or boyfriend, or for shoplifting.¹⁵

2.16 Legal Aid New South Wales (Legal Aid) offered a case study that, it suggested, demonstrated how the proposed changes would trigger the character test for a person both as a juvenile and as an adult:

Before he turned 18, Abbas got into an argument with his sister about what they were watching on TV. The incident escalated and resulted in Abbas shouting and pushing his sister. Abbas' mother called the police, who charged Abbas with assault and took out a provisional ADVO. Ultimately, Abbas received a bond in the Children's Court and was made the subject of a final ADVO for a period of 12 months.

Several months later, and after Abbas turned 18, he again has an argument with his sister and swore at her. His mother called the police, who charged Abbas with breaching the ADVO.

He was ultimately dealt with in the Local Court by way of a section 10A conviction with no further penalty.¹⁶

2.17 In its submission, the Law Council expressed concern about 'the impact of the proposed measures on children', noting that while the explanatory memorandum to the bill provides that the provisions would apply to children 'only in exceptional circumstances...it does not prescribe what these exceptional circumstances will be'.¹⁷

2.18 As such, the Law Council considered that 'there is a high possibility that this will negatively impact families and young people' and submitted the bill should be amended to capture the intention set out in the explanatory memorandum—that a child's visa will only be cancelled in exceptional circumstances.¹⁸

13 New Zealand Government, Submission 4, p. 3. The New Zealand Government noted in its submission that 'a New Zealand minor's Australian visa has been cancelled this year under the Act', but that the decision was overturned by the Administrative Appeals Tribunal 'on the basis that due consideration had not been given to their best interests as a child'—see p. 3.

17 Law Council, Submission 9, p. 12.

18 Law Council, Submission 9, p. 12.

2.19 Another way in which submitters suggested the proposed changes may adversely affect children is through a child's relationship with a primary visa applicant.

2.20 For example, the Australian Catholic Migrant and Refugee Office (ACMRO) of the Australian Catholic Bishops Conference expressed concern about the effect of a primary applicant's visa being cancelled on character grounds on spouses and children. The ACMRO submitted that spouses and children 'are not the ones who have committed the crime, but consequential victims of the action of the primary applicant's criminal behaviour'.¹⁹ The ACMRO suggested that the proposed changes to the Act could serve to uproot and disorient children's lives 'because of actions taken which were not in their control'.²⁰

2.21 It was on that basis that the ACMRO urged:

...that due consideration is given to families, spouses and children, caught up in these situations beyond their control when drafting and proposing the necessary Legislative Instruments that will guide the decision making processes.²¹

2.22 Similarly, the ASRC outlined how a relationship with a primary visa applicant could adversely affect women and children who are victims of family violence:

The physical elements of a 'designated offence' in the Bill include breach of 'an order made by a court or tribunal for the personal protection of another person'. This provision will most commonly, and is intended to, apply to intervention orders relating to family violence. This provision highlights our existing concern regarding the cancellation of visas of family violence offenders, in circumstances where the affected family member is dependent on that same visa.

Most often, the victim of family violence is the wife and/or child of the perpetrator. When families are present in Australia as visa holders, there is generally one primary visa holder (often the husband) and one or more 'dependent' visa holders (often a spouse and/or child). When a husband's visa is cancelled on account of family violence offences, any 'dependents' will also have their visas cancelled. This means that a wife and child who have suffered family violence will have their visas cancelled and they will be removed from Australia together with the perpetrator.²²

2.23 The statement of compatibility with human rights with respect to the bill addressed the issue of the rights of minors, and noted that the best interests of the child will be taken into account regarding a decision to refuse or cancel a visa in accordance with Australia's international law obligations:

19 Australian Catholic Migrant and Refugee Office (ACMRO), Submission 5, p. 2.

20 ACMRO, Submission 5, p. 2.

21 ACMRO, Submission 5, p. 2.

22 ASRC, Submission 8, pp. 5–6.

While rights relating to family and children generally weigh heavy against cancellation or refusal, there will be circumstances where they may be outweighed by the risk to the Australian community due to the seriousness of the person's criminal record or past behaviour or associations.²³

2.24 Indeed, as noted above, delegates who are considering whether to refuse or cancel a visa on character grounds are required to consider the best interests of minors in Australia.

New Zealand residents

2.25 A number of submitters discussed the anticipated effect of the proposed changes to the character test on New Zealanders with reference to the effect of the 2014 changes on this group of visa holders.

2.26 New Zealanders living in Australia have a unique visa status and, owing to their broad set of rights provided by this status, 'have had a far lower citizenship take-up rate compared to other migrant groups'.²⁴ As a result, New Zealanders tend to be more liable to deportation than visa holders of other nationalities.

2.27 Oz Kiwi, the peak body for the issues affecting the rights of New Zealanders residing in Australia, provided an overview of the current visa arrangements for New Zealanders:

New Zealanders arriving in Australia have been granted a Special Category Visa (SCV) since the introduction of the universal visa system in 1994. The SCV is a nationality-specific visa that allows New Zealand citizens to reside indefinitely in Australia. It has been included in both the repealed Australian Citizenship Act 1948 and the Citizenship Act 2007 (Cth) as a visa that can fulfil permanent residence requirements, subject to ministerial declaration. However, since 2001 ministerial declarations have only extended 'permanent resident' status under citizenship law to certain SCV holders who were living in Australia by 26 February 2001.²⁵

2.28 Oz Kiwi discussed what it considered to be the disproportionate effect that the visa cancellation provisions introduced in 2014 have had on New Zealanders:

Since s501 was amended in December 2014 1,200 New Zealanders have been deported. Visa cancellations have increased tenfold under the revised s501. Of the 2,850 people deported between July 2014 and June 2017, 51 per cent were New Zealanders.²⁶

2.29 Statistics produced by the Commonwealth Ombudsman for its 2016 investigation report into section 501 of the Act, illustrate the high rate of visa cancellation for New Zealanders, set out at Figure 2.1.

2.30 The Border Crossing Observatory observed that, since the changes to the character test introduced in 2014, New Zealanders have also 'become the largest nationality group for visa cancellations and deportations under s501 which has included a number of long term residents'.²⁷

2.31 Oz Kiwi attributed this overrepresentation to several factors, including that 'any individual who has resided [in Australia] for a decade is no longer protected' from visa cancellation and subsequent detention.²⁸

2.33 In its submission, the New Zealand Government set out the reasons New Zealanders 'have been disproportionately affected by Australia's deportation policies since 2014':

- The lowering of the criminal record threshold inevitably led to greater numbers of non-citizens liable for mandatory visa cancellation. This affected New Zealanders more than other nationalities due to their lower dual citizenship rates.
- The removal of protection from deportation for long-term residents (of 10 years or longer) had a particularly disproportionate effect on New Zealanders, because New Zealanders are the only nationality with the ability to reside for longer than 10 years in Australia without permanent residency or citizenship.²⁹

2.34 The New Zealand Government suggested that the visa cancellation provisions introduced in 2014 'have been corrosive to the New Zealand – Australia relationship due to the disproportionate effect of Australia's policy on New Zealand and the lack of reciprocity of treatment'. It noted, for example, that:

The underlying principle of New Zealand's deportation policy is that New Zealand accepts some responsibility for the behaviour of people who have lived in New Zealand on residence class visas for long periods of time –

they've made New Zealand their home and New Zealand has benefited from their contribution.³⁰

2.35 The New Zealand Government submitted that, just as New Zealand has some responsibility for long-term residents of New Zealand, 'Australia has responsibilities for those people who are products of Australia'.³¹ The New Zealand Government concluded that the proposed changes 'would make a bad situation worse for New Zealanders and therefore for New Zealand'.³²

2.36 The responsibility of the Australian government for New Zealanders who have long resided in Australia was also discussed by Oz Kiwi, which expressed concern about the expected effect of the proposed changes on long-term residents:

Oz Kiwi has long been concerned about the impact that visa cancellation may have on a person who has been residing in Australia for a long period of time. The proposed Migration Amendment Bill will cast the net wider. Prior to 1998, the deportation of non-citizens who had committed criminal offences was covered by sections 200 and 201 of the Migration Act 1958 (Cth). Under these sections, the Minister could only deport a non-citizen who had been convicted of a crime (punishable by imprisonment for two years or more) if the non-citizen had been resident in Australia for less than ten years. Subsequent amendments to the Act in relation to section 501, have been used to cancel the visas of permanent residents who have lived in Australia for more than ten years.³³

Humanitarian visa holders

2.37 A number of submitters raised concerns that the bill is inconsistent with Australia's non-refoulement obligations under international law that prohibit Australia from returning someone to a country where they will face persecution or serious human rights violations.³⁴

2.38 In its submission, the ASRC set out the effect of the visa cancellation provisions on refugees and asylum seekers with reference to non-refoulement. The ASRC suggested that requirements in departmental guidelines to consider such international obligations are insufficient, and that:

The state of domestic law is that, if a person's visa is refused or cancelled, they may be returned to their country of origin even if they face persecution or other serious harm.³⁵

35 ASRC, Submission 8, p. 2.

2.39 The Refugee Council informed the committee that the consequence of a visa cancellation for refugees 'is indefinite detention, as they cannot be returned to their country of origin without breaching our non-refoulement obligations'.³⁶ The Refugee Council informed the committee that, more recently, it has heard that:

...visas are being cancelled without people being detained. Instead, these people are left without a valid visa in the community, without the right to work and without other means to support themselves. Such enforced destitution is also a breach of our international obligations.³⁷

2.40 In its submission, Refugee Legal provided a case study example of a Rohingya³⁸ refugee to illustrate its submission that the bill would 'have a significant adverse impact on the lives of vulnerable people, including children, refugees, people seeking asylum and victims of domestic violence'.³⁹ In the example of the Rohingya refugee, it stated the adverse impact could be indefinite detention of a stateless person.

2.41 In respect of the time spent in detention as a result of visa cancellations, the Commonwealth Ombudsman reported in 2016 that:

The average length of time in detention for those who requested revocation was 150 days in the period 1 January 2014 to 31 December 2015. On 29 February 2016, the average time to process a s 501(3A) revocation request had increased to 153 days. We note at the close of business on 1 March 2015 there were, however, 158 cases where persons have spent six months or more awaiting an outcome and 21 cases where persons have spent 12 months or more awaiting an outcome.⁴⁰

2.42 Although these concerns have been raised with the committee by submitters, the statement of compatibility with human rights in the explanatory memorandum to the bill emphasises Australia's commitment to its non-refoulement obligations.⁴¹ These obligations 'are considered as part of the decision whether to refuse or cancel a visa on character grounds', such that:

Anyone who is found to engage Australia's non-refoulement obligations during the refusal or cancellation decision or in subsequent visa or Ministerial Intervention processes prior to removal will not be removed in breach of those obligations.⁴²

Other issues

2.43 Submitters to the inquiry also raised broader issues of concern regarding the proposed amendments to the existing character test in the Act.

2.44 Other issues that were raised but are not examined in this section included the use of the phrase 'knowingly concerned' in respect of criminal conduct;⁴³ the constitutionality of the provisions;⁴⁴ foreign convictions;⁴⁵ and the issue of rehabilitation of prisoners.⁴⁶

Aiding and abetting a designated offence

2.45 One of the designated offences that will be introduced if the bill is passed is the offence of 'aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring' the commission of one or more of the offences set out at subparagraphs 501(7AA)(a)(i)–(iv).⁴⁷

2.46 The Federation of Ethnic Communities' Councils of Australia (FECCA) expressed its concern with this provision—proposed subparagraph 501(7AA)(a)(v)—which it suggested 'will disproportionately affect women, involved in a relationship with an offender, who are often victims of intimate partner and domestic violence'.⁴⁸

2.47 The Law Council also expressed concern with the inclusion of 'aiding' or 'abetting' in the definition of a designated offence, stating that the provision 'could have a considerable impact on vulnerable individuals and in particular women involved in a relationship with the offender' and could, in turn, 'serve to de-incentivise individuals from cooperating with authorities'.⁴⁹

2.48 The NSWCCCL considered that this provision would 'strongly discourage people from letting the police know of offences in which they or those they care about have played a small part'.⁵⁰

2.49 However, as the explanatory memorandum states, the physical elements of the designated offence set out at proposed subparagraphs 501(7AA)(a)(v)–(viii) are intended to:

...capture those non-citizens with links to those activities that pose a risk to the Australian community, such as (but not limited to) organised crime, outlaw motor cycle gangs or those who, without committing the physical elements as set out in subparagraphs 501(7AA)(a)(i)–(iv), have a level of involvement in the commission of a designated offence that gives rise to an offence in and of itself. This makes it clear that the intention is that non-citizens who are criminals or who are associated with criminal activity should not remain in, or be allowed to enter, Australia.⁵¹

Maximum sentencing penalties

2.50 Proposed paragraph 501(7AA)(b) of the bill introduces the elements of a designated offence with respect to offences punishable by imprisonment for a maximum term of not less than two years.

2.51 The Law Council expressed its concern with this provision—it considered the maximum sentencing penalty provision has 'the potential to undermine the sentencing function of the judicial system and the discretion it possesses with regards to sentencing offenders'.⁵² The Law Council also stated:

30. Proposed paragraph 501(7AA)(b)... seeks to shift the threshold for visa cancellation or refusal away from an individual's imposed sentence (which reflects the seriousness of the actual conduct) to the offence itself and its maximum possible penalty, regardless of the actual sentence handed down to the individual.

31. It is noted that maximum penalties are reserved for the worst, most serious examples of an offence. The Law Council is concerned that this shift fails to appreciate the role of criminal sentencing and the careful consideration that is given by the courts to a range of social factors when an individual is convicted of an offence, including mitigating circumstances such as age, health, disability, moral culpability, or the objective seriousness of the relevant offence.

32. The Law Council submits that having a cancellation provision based on the maximum possible sentence rather than the actual sentenced imposed fails to consider both the legislative structure of the criminal law legislation or the circumstances of the offence and individual concerned, and does not adequately reflect the seriousness of the individual's conduct or risk. The law has long recognised that different circumstances give rise to different standards of culpability. As such, possible maximum sentences are not a proper basis for determining seriousness.⁵³

2.52 Legal Aid made similar observations in its submission, and suggested that the role of the sentencing court is undermined by the bill, explaining:

The actual penalty imposed in a particular matter is a more reliable indication of the objective criminality, than the maximum penalty. Weighing the objective seriousness of an offence with the subjective features of the offender is the very purpose of the sentencing exercise.⁵⁴

52 Law Council, Submission 9, p. 10.

53 Law Council, Submission 9, p. 10.

54 Legal Aid, Submission 14, p. 6.

2.53 The Australian Lawyers for Human Rights (ALHR) provided examples of those offences which may be punishable by a term of imprisonment of two years or more, but for which it may not be appropriate to impose the two year sentence of imprisonment 'and which the Australian community would consider to be a minor or trifling offence':

For example, in Western Australia the summary penalty for damaging property by graffiti ranges from a community based order to a two year term of imprisonment. The criminal law system appropriately already has the power to consider the risk a person who damages property by graffiti may pose the community and determine that it does not warrant a two year term of imprisonment. Further, it is implausible that the Australian community would consider that the offence of graffiti is serious enough to warrant the refusal or cancellation of a visa, even though it can potentially attract a two year term of imprisonment. However, this is the type of offence the Bill captures through its expansion of powers without any proper consideration of the actual sentence imposed by the criminal law system.⁵⁵

2.54 In regard to the proposed introduction of the two-year maximum penalties, the Working Group noted that maximum sentences provide 'for aggravating circumstances in the course of offending, where harsher punishment is warranted':

In the vast majority of cases limited or no such circumstance exists. Courts, accordingly, rarely impose the maximum penalty. An actual judicial sentence is a more appropriate indication of the seriousness of offending.⁵⁶

2.55 The Working Group submitted that 'the Bill will capture a significant number of individuals whose conduct may not fall under the commonly accepted definition of a serious offence'.⁵⁷

2.56 The Working Group also expressed concern with the low criminal threshold in the bill, stating that the bill:

...will capture a significant number of individuals whose offences could not fall under the commonly accepted definition of 'serious offences'. This is primarily due to the inclusion of certain offences with a potential sentence of not less than two years, regardless of the judicial sentence given. For example, some offences which would fall under this category include:

- verbal threats,
- ...
- Any attempted offence of the nature stipulated, being an offence not carried out.⁵⁸

56 Working Group, Submission 13, p. 9 (citations omitted).

57 Working Group, Submission 13, p. 11.

58 Working Group, Submission 13, p. 8 (citations omitted).

2.57 However, the explanatory memorandum to the bill provides that the intention of this proposed amendment 'is to make it clear that a designated offence must be a serious offence, and not merely a minor or trifling offence'.⁵⁹ Further, the proposed amendment:

...also sets an objective standard for the determination of what constitutes a designated offence, which relies upon established existing criminal law and law enforcement processes in states and territories to determine the seriousness of a given offence.

This will ensure that discretionary visa cancellation and refusal decisions are based on objective standards of criminality and seriousness.⁶⁰

Access to justice

2.58 A number of submitters suggested that the proposed amendments to section 501 of the Act would provide limited access to merits review.

2.59 For example, FECCA outlined how, in its view, the proposed changes 'may lead to grave injustice and the eroding of individual human rights and freedoms' in the context of merits review of a decision to refuse or cancel a visa on character grounds.⁶¹ FECCA explained that:

The current review process for refusals and cancellations is characterised by great expense to the individual, no access to legal representation and a strict timeframe for review which relies on the subject of the order understanding the complexities of the AAT. The removal of an individual from Australia—including some who have spent their whole lives in this country—can have a devastating impact on the individual, their family and community.⁶²

2.60 The Law Council expressed similar concerns, and informed the committee that it had found that there had been a 'significant increase in demand for legal assistance following the expansion of visa cancellation powers'.⁶³

2.61 In its submission, the ALHR spoke to equality before the courts and tribunals:

...the practical impact of the Bill undermines this right because it undermines judicial direction and the determinations the criminal law system makes during sentencing as to whether a person poses a risk to the community and therefore whether the Court should impose a sentence of imprisonment or not. The Bill not only reinforces a discriminatory regime where two people who have committed the same crime are treated very differently depending on whether they are a citizen or not, but also introduces a regime where a non-citizen may commit the same offence, but in a less serious context and receive a less serious sentence, yet still be subject to a more serious outcome, including arbitrary detention and removal from Australia.⁶⁴

2.62 The Refugee Council stated that:

...non-citizens could be held in indefinite detention or deported without any form of substantive independent review, as there is no right to review by the Administrative Appeals Tribunal if the decision is made personally by a Minister. Even if the Tribunal can review the decision, this can be overturned by the Minister.⁶⁵

2.63 However, the statement of compatibility with human rights provides that the bill does not amend 'the relevant procedures and review mechanisms available', and that the bill accords with Australia's international obligations:

To the extent that a larger number of people may have their visa cancelled as a result of this amendment, possibly leading to their expulsion, the processes are in accordance with the procedural requirements of Article 13 [of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights] and review of the decisions is available – merits review by the Administrative Appeals Tribunal and/or judicial review for decisions made by a delegate, and judicial review of decisions made by the Minister personally.⁶⁶

Retrospectivity

2.64 A number of submitters expressed concern that the proposed measures of the bill may be retrospective in nature. For example, the Law Council considered that, as a result of the proposed amendments, a non-citizen could be removed 'for their historic involvement in a designated offence, which in the absence of the proposed amendments may not have amounted to a failure to pass the character test'.⁶⁷ The Law Council submitted that:

...there has been insufficient justification for the possible retrospective nature of the proposed measures, particularly when consideration is given to the considerable impact on the lives of those that may be affected by the reforms.⁶⁸

2.65 The ASRC also discussed this issue, stating that item 7 of the bill 'undermines the rule of law and creates legal uncertainty for legal applicants', and also that it is:

...unjust to apply the new character requirements to offences committed prior to the commencement of the concept of a 'designated offence.' This would result in visa holders who may have lived in Australia for decades and received a fine or minimal sentence for a 'designated offence' many years ago, become suddenly liable to visa cancellation, regardless of the fact that they could not have predicted their actions may result in visa cancellation at the time. We submit that this is an unacceptable outcome.⁶⁹

2.66 Legal Aid also expressed concern with the retrospective nature of the bill, a measure which it opposed on the following grounds:

Firstly, the Bill impacts significantly and in a punitive fashion on the rights of affected people. Secondly, the necessity for retrospectivity is not justified, given that the Department and the Minister already have broad powers to issue NOICCs under sections 501(1) and (2) of the Act for any offences that are defined as designated offences. Finally, Legal Aid NSW is concerned that retrospective consideration of the expanded test - in circumstances where no previous action has been taken to refuse or cancel a visa following an earlier conviction - cannot be undertaken fairly and transparently.⁷⁰

2.67 The Department did identify in its submission that the new designated offence ground proposed by the bill 'will apply retroactively—meaning the decision-maker can consider convictions for a designated offence which occurred before, on, or after the commencement of this Bill'.⁷¹ However, the Department also stated that this is consistent with previous amendments to the character test, such as:

- 1998 amendments to sections 501(6)(a)—relating to a person [who] has a substantial criminal record, 501(6)(c)—relating to past and present criminal or general conduct and 501(6)(d)—relating to a person's conduct if they were to enter or remain in Australia.
- 2011 amendments to sections 501(6)(aa)—relating to convictions while in, or escaped from immigration detention, and 501(6)(ab)—relating to convictions for escaping immigration detention.
- 2014 amendments to section 501(3A)—the introduction of the mandatory cancellation framework.⁷²

Committee view

2.68 The committee acknowledges the concerns raised by some submitters with respect to the proposed amendments to the Act by the bill. However, the committee considers that the amendments are necessary to strengthen the current visa refusal and cancellation provisions at section 501 of the Act.

2.69 The committee acknowledges and agrees with the view put by the Minister in his second reading speech—that is, that the bill:

69 ASRC, Submission 8, p. 9.

70 Legal Aid, Submission 14, p. 13.

72 Department of Home Affairs, Submission 15, p. 6.

...ensures that noncitizens who have been convicted of serious offences and who pose a risk to the safety of the Australian community are appropriately considered for visa refusal or cancellation.⁷³

2.70 The committee also agrees with the Minister that the bill sends a message that the Australian community will not tolerate non-citizens who have been convicted of serious offences.⁷⁴

2.71 The committee further considers that there is need to strengthen current provisions to protect Australians against harm from non-citizens. The committee considers that the Australian government must therefore legislate to ensure that the Australian community is safe and secure—the community expects the government to do so.

2.72 The committee is satisfied that the bill strikes the appropriate balance between the protection of the Australian community and the rights of non-citizens who have committed criminal acts, and therefore recommends the passage of the bill.

Recommendation 1

2.73 The committee recommends that the bill be passed.

Australian Greens dissenting report

1.1 The Australian Greens acknowledge the extensive work of the Committee in this inquiry, and thank everyone who made a public submission, or gave evidence at a public hearing.

1.2 The Australian Greens hold many significant and substantive concerns with the bill before this inquiry, the Migration Amendment (Strengthening the Character Test) Bill 2018.

Public policy should be based on evidence

1.3 Firstly, the Australian Greens question the need for this legislation.

1.4 In its report on the bill, the Joint Standing Committee on Migration (JCSM), as cited earlier in this report, noted:

... there exist 'community concerns about the escalation of violent crimes such as homicide, serious assault, rape, indecent assault, aggravated burglary, motor vehicle theft and rioting; particularly in Victoria', and expressed the view that 'such serious criminal offences committed by visa holders must have appropriate consequences'.

1.5 There are already appropriate consequences for criminal offences committed by visa holders, as there are for all residents of and visitors to Australia. But this bill, as have previous amendments to the Migration Act 1958, creates additional and disproportionate consequences for migrant visa holders.

1.6 Also of concern is that such overreaching legislation would be drafted to address perceived concerns, and not evidenced problems – particularly when these concerns are often inflamed by those who would use them for legislative and political agendas. Despite community concerns, homicide and related offences are on the decrease, as is unlawful entry with intent and armed robbery, and the number of offenders including youth offenders – engaging in criminal activity.¹

1.7 In Victoria, which the JCSM gave special mention, and despite all the conservative rhetoric of youth gangs, there has been a significant decrease in youth offences, with Victoria having the second lowest youth offender rate (behind only the Australian Capital Territory).²

Arbitrary and non-reviewable decisions

1.8 The Australian Greens are also concerned about this bill's move away from an individual sentence-based model, to an arbitrary potential penalty model. When considering this aspect of the bill, the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights (PJCHR) noted:

... the existing framework generally focuses on a sentence-based approach whereby, for example, the determination of whether a person has a 'substantial criminal record' is by reference to a person's sentence of imprisonment. The proposed amendments provide additional bases upon which the minister may cancel or refuse a visa by reference to the length of time for which the 'designated offence' may be punishable, rather than the length of time for which the person is sentenced.

1.9 As is the case with mandatory sentencing, which is also widely condemned by the legal and academic professions, this arbitrary model is blunt and unjust. As argued by Australian Lawyers for Human Rights:

[This] Bill fails to take into account the role of the criminal law system and judicial discretion in Australia in considering the material facts of an offence and imposing a sentence, including a sentence of imprisonment, which is appropriate in all the circumstances of the case and which therefore reflects the seriousness of the crime and the risk the person poses to the Australian community.

1.10 The Human Rights Commission further argued:

Given the potential impact on individual rights, any decision to refuse or cancel a visa should be made properly and take into account all of the relevant circumstances ... In extreme cases, this can amount to arbitrary decision making under international human rights law.

1.11 Also troubling is that this bill targets a cohort that already has limited access to justice. As the Federation of Ethnic Communities' Councils of Australia (FECCA) noted:

Currently the Migration Act adversely impact on highly vulnerable sections of Australia's community who have no access to free legal assistance with the proposed amendments will only further restrict their access to justice.

Effects on individuals, families, and communities

1.12 FECCA, along with the Human Rights Commission, also raised concerns regarding the bill's ability to deport long-term residents of Australia, and to separate families, noting:

... an individual may be removed to a country the language of which they do not speak; where they have spent little time (or never lived); and where they have no familial, social or economic connections.

1.13 Regarding families, FECCA argued the bill presents a real risk of facilitating:

... separation of mothers and fathers from children, including dependent children, and other family members. [Furthermore,] the proposed inclusion of 'aiding and abetting' will disproportionately affect women, involved in a relationship with an offender, who are often victims of intimate partner and domestic violence.

1.14 This bill, particularly when cancelling the visa of a father, will therefore potentially create a twofold blow for dependents, particularly, but not limited to, when there cancellation was on the basis of family violence. As the Asylum Seeker Resource Centre (ASRC) submitted:

Most often, the victim of family violence is the wife and/or child of the perpetrator. When families are present in Australia as visa holders, there is generally one primary visa holder (often the husband) and one or more 'dependent' visa holders (often a spouse and/or child). When a husband's visa is cancelled on account of family violence offences, any 'dependents' will also have their visas cancelled. This means that a wife and child who have suffered family violence will have their visas cancelled and they will be removed from Australia together with the perpetrator.

1.15 Such a situation, the ASRC further argues will lead to:

... an impossible conflict of interest, as the prospect of losing their visa and that of their children may deter victims of family violence from seeking the essential protection from violence that they need.

Rights and welfare of children

1.16 The Australian Greens are also very concerned about how this bill will impact on the rights and welfare of children. The Refugee Council of Australia, in arguing this bill would breach our commitment to international obligations to the protection of children, such as the Convention on the Rights of the Child, noted:

There is nothing in this Bill that prescribes any differential treatment for children. While the Explanatory Memorandum suggests that their visas will be cancelled only in 'exceptional circumstances', the Bill does not spell out what they are or any legislative process to ensure that consideration. Indeed, it is clear from the Explanatory Memorandum that the Bill contemplates that some children will be subject to indefinite detention or removal because of this Bill. This is consistent with political commentary which suggests the Bill is intended to be used in relation to children.

1.17 The ASRC also notes that the arbitrary concept of 'designated offences' will disproportionately impact children and young people, as:

Children are more likely to receive lower sentences for criminal convictions and will generally only receive custodial sentences as a last resort. However, under the Bill, such sentencing considerations will not be taken into account and children will be exposed to visa refusal or cancellation and potentially unaccompanied deportation.

Recognition of time and ties to Australia

1.18 Oz Kiwi, in its submission, noted:

Prior to 1998, the deportation of non-citizens who had committed criminal offences was covered by sections 200 and 201 of the Migration Act 1958 (Cth). Under these sections, the Minister could only deport a non-citizen who had been convicted of a crime (punishable by imprisonment for two years or more) if the non-citizen had been resident in Australia for less than ten years.

1.19 The Australian Greens believe Oz Kiwi's recommendation that any non-citizen who has either lived in Australia for more than ten (10) years, or who arrived in Australia before the age of ten (10), should not be able to have their visa cancelled, warrants further consideration by the Parliament.

1.20 Such an amendment would also bring Australia into line with its Trans-Tasman Travel Arrangement partner, New Zealand, which has a tiered deportation system that takes into account how long a person has lived there, and the seriousness of their crimes. In New Zealand, a non-citizen cannot be deported after 10 years of living in the country.

Retrospectivity, and the rule of law

1.21 The Australian Greens have long argued that retrospective laws are inconsistent with the rule of law – particularly when applied to punitive legislation. The amendments in this bill will apply to anyone who holds a visa and committed or was convicted of a designated offence at any time. The Law Council of Australia submitted its concerns that the bill:

... could be used to remove a non-citizen for their historic involvement in a designated offence, which in the absence of the proposed amendments may not have amounted to a failure to pass the character test [and] that there has been insufficient justification for the possible retrospective nature of the proposed measures, particularly when consideration is given to the considerable impact on the lives of those that may be affected by the reforms.

Conclusion

1.22 In summary, this bill – which targets migrants and bypasses judicial process – will lower an already low bar for refusing or cancelling the visas of non-citizens, for reasons, as identified in the explanatory memorandum, such as sharing intimate images, verbally threatening someone, associating with members of a gang, or holding a rock in a threatening way.

1.23 With the Government, joint-committees of this Parliament, and witnesses for this inquiry all failing to present a case for why these additional powers and legislation are necessary, and given the Minister already has legislated powers to cancel the visas of serious offenders under the Migration Act 1958, the Australian Greens will recommend this bill not be passed by the Senate.

Recommendation 1

1.24 The Australian Greens recommend that the Senate does not pass this bill.
