Introduction

This paper presents a statistical analysis of the Western Australian election held on 10 February 2001. A descriptive account of the election has been previously published by the Parliamentary Library in 'Western Australian Election 2001', Glenn Worthington, Current Issues Brief No. 10 2000–01.

The paper provides details of the result in each Legislative Assembly district and votes for each candidate in the Legislative Council. Summary tables for first preference and two candidate preferred votes are also provided.

An analysis of the destination of One Nation and Green preferences is contained in an appendix to the paper. The paper shows that despite receiving only 37.2 per cent of the first preference vote, the ALP easily won the election after receiving over 55 per cent of second preference votes from other parties. The paper estimates that the ALP received 51.8 per cent of One Nation preferences and 68.1 per cent of Green preferences.

Appendix: Estimating the Direction of One Nation and Green Preferences

One of the most interesting aspects of the Western Australian Legislative Assembly elections was the role that preferences of the minor parties, especially One Nation and The Greens, played in the determination of the final outcome. Preferences were required to be distributed in 43 of the 57 electoral districts, a substantial increase on the previous election where preferences were required to be distributed in 30 districts.

The role of One Nation and Green preferences was particularly significant considering the share of first preference votes each party received and the policy of One Nation of directing preferences against sitting members.

The Western Australian Electoral Commission has published data on the distribution of preferences for all districts in order that a 'two candidate preferred vote' be obtained. The two candidate preferred figure shows the vote received by the two remaining candidates after preferences of all other candidates have been distributed. However, this data does not provide the actual final two party destination of minor party preferences. This distinction can best be illustrated by looking at the district of Albany.

Albany: Distribution of Preferences

Count	IND	ALP	GRN	IND	PHON	LP
First Preferences	1001	3960	1060	334	2035	4141
First Distribution	107	49	45	-334	70	55
Progress Total	1108	4009	1105		2105	4196
Second Distribution	575	304	-1105		101	112
Progress Total	1683	4313			2206	4308
Third Distribution	-1683	860			361	429
Progress Total		5173			2567	4737
Fourth Distribution		1487			-2567	1011
Total		6660				5748

Here the Green candidate was eliminated second and his preferences were distributed between the ALP, LP, One Nation and an Independent. Thus the final destination of Green preferences, in terms of ALP or LP, cannot be obtained. The One Nation candidate was eliminated last and his preferences were distributed between the ALP and LP. Thus an estimate of the final destination of One Nation preferences has been obtained. However, a complication occurs because the One Nation candidate has received 532 second or subsequent preference votes from previously eliminated candidates, so that the One Nation preferences distributed between the ALP and LP contain preference votes from other candidates. If these votes are from candidates more likely to favour one of the major parties over the other then they may introduce a bias into the estimation process. In the case of Albany they include votes from the Greens and Democrats, who are more likely to favour the ALP over the LP, thus inflating the estimate of the share of One Nation preferences flowing to the ALP.

In order to overcome this problem it is necessary to assume that second preference votes distributed to eliminated candidates (in the above example the One Nation candidate) are the same as first preference votes received by the candidate. By making this assumption the final destination of minor party candidates (where the party was the last to be eliminated) can be estimated. The table below shows the distribution of One Nation and Green preferences in districts where either party was the last party eliminated and the ALP and the LP were the remaining parties. One Nation was the last party eliminated in 24 districts and the Greens were the last party eliminated in 17 districts. When the figures for individual districts are aggregated they show that for the whole state the ALP received an estimated 51.8 per cent of One Nation preferences while the LP/NP Coalition received an estimated 48.2 per cent. In the case of the Greens the ALP did even better receiving an estimated 68.1 per cent of preferences to 31.9 per cent for the Coalition.

In addition to the problems outlined above two further complications should be noted. Firstly, the estimates below exclude instances where One Nation or the Greens were not the last party eliminated. Secondly, the estimates exclude instances where both major parties are not the final two parties (i.e. either the ALP or LP eliminated before the final two parties). The exclusion of these instances may have an effect on the estimates shown, but it is not possible to quantify this effect.
