(b) expresses concern that children who are the victims of abuse also experience trauma when providing evidence in criminal proceedings against those who have abused them and that, in these circumstances, the trauma is often exacerbated through strenuous cross-examination and the requirement to provide evidence at committal proceedings in addition to the criminal trial;

(c) notes that while most state jurisdictions have access to closed circuit television systems, evidence indicates that these systems are not always used to facilitate the giving of evidence by victims of child sex abuse;

(d) expresses concern that children in some states are more likely to experience a higher level of trauma when giving evidence regarding abuse than children in other states, given the different arrangements which apply from state to state;

(e) notes evidence which indicates that the trauma experienced by victims of child sex abuse may deter them from reporting such abuse and may therefore prevent the perpetrators of such abuse from being brought to justice; and
