LSU officers regularly work across multiple scrutiny committee secretariats.

Committee information

Under the Human Rights (Parliamentary Scrutiny) Act 2011 (the Act), the committee is required to examine bills, Acts and legislative instruments for compatibility with human rights, and report its findings to both Houses of the Parliament. The committee may also inquire into and report on any human rights matters referred to it by the Attorney-General.

The committee assesses legislation against the human rights contained in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR); as well as five other treaties relating to particular groups and subject matter.<sup>2</sup> Appendix 2 contains brief descriptions of the rights most commonly arising in legislation examined by the committee.

The establishment of the committee builds on Parliament's established tradition of legislative scrutiny. The committee's scrutiny of legislation is undertaken as an assessment against Australia's international human rights obligations, to enhance understanding of and respect for human rights in Australia and ensure attention is given to human rights issues in legislative and policy development.

Some human rights obligations are absolute under international law. However, in relation to most human rights, prescribed limitations on the enjoyment of a right may be justified under international law if certain requirements are met. Accordingly, a focus of the committee's reports is to determine whether any limitation of a human right identified in proposed legislation is justifiable. A measure that limits a right must be prescribed by law; be in pursuit of a legitimate objective; be rationaly connected to its stated objective; and be a proportionate way to achieve that objective (the limitation criteria). These four criteria provide the analytical framework for the committee.

A statement of compatibility for a measure limiting a right must provide a detailed and evidence-based assessment of the measure against the limitation criteria.

Where legislation raises human rights concerns, the committee's usual approach is to seek a response from the legislation proponent, or else draw the matter to the attention of the proponent on an advice-only basis.

More information on the committee's analytical framework and approach to human rights scrutiny of legislation is contained in Guidance Note 1 (see Appendix 4).

Chapter 1

New and continuing matters

- 1.1 This chapter provides assessments of the human rights compatibility of:
- bills introduced into the Parliament between 5 and 8 February 2018 (consideration of 8 bills from this period has been deferred);<sup>1</sup>
  - legislative instruments registered on the Federal Register of Legislation between 15 December 2017 and 8 January 2018 (consideration of 6 legislative instruments from this period has been deferred);<sup>2</sup> and
  - bills and legislative instruments previously deferred.

Instruments not raising human rights concerns

1.2 The committee has examined the legislative instruments registered in the period identified above, as listed on the Federal Register of Legislation. Instruments raising human rights concerns are identified in this chapter.

1.3 The committee has concluded that the remaining instruments do not raise human rights concerns, either because they do not engage human rights, they contain only justifiable (or marginal) limitations on human rights or because they promote human rights and do not require additional comment.

1 See Appendix 1 for a list of legislation in respect of which the committee has deferred its consideration. The committee generally takes an exceptions based approach to its substantive examination of legislation.

2 The committee examines legislative instruments registered in the relevant period, as listed on the Federal Register of Legislation. See, <https://www.legislation.gov.au/>.

Response required

1.4 The committee seeks a response or further information from the relevant minister or legislation proponent with respect to the following bills and instruments.

National Security Legislation Amendment (Espionage and Foreign Interference) Bill 2017

|-------------------|--|
| Purpose    | Seeks to amend various Acts in relation to criminal law to: amend espionage offences; introduce new foreign interference offences targeting covert, deceptive or threatening actions by foreign entities; amend Commonwealth secrecy offences; introduce comprehensive new sabotage offences; amend various offences, including treason; introduce a new theft of trade secrets offence; introduce a new aggravated offence for providing false and misleading information in the context of security clearance processes; and allow law enforcement agencies to have access to telecommunications interception powers. The bill also seeks to make amendments relevant to the Foreign Influence Transparency Scheme, including seeking to amend the Foreign Influence Transparency Scheme Act 2017 (currently a bill before Parliament) |
| Portfolio  | Attorney-General   |
| Introduced | House of Representatives, 7 December 2017  |
| Rights     | Freedom of expression; right to an effective remedy; privacy; freedom of association; presumption of innocence; to take part in public affairs (see Appendix 2 )  |
| Status     | Seeking additional information   |

Secrecy provisions

1.5 Schedule 2 of the bill would amend the Crimes Act 1914 (Crimes Act) and the Criminal Code Act 1995 (Criminal Code) to introduce a range of new criminal offences related to the disclosure or use of government information. These replace existing offences.<sup>1</sup>

1 Currently, section 70 of the Crimes Act criminalises the disclosure of information by Commonwealth officers, obtained due to their role, in circumstances where they have a duty not to disclose such information. Similarly, section 79 of the Crimes Act also currently criminalises the disclosure of 'official secrets'. The bill proposes to replace these provisions.

Offences relating to 'inherently harmful information'

1.6 Proposed subsections 122.1(1)-(2) of the Criminal Code provide that a person commits an offence if the person communicates or deals with information that is 'inherently harmful information' in circumstances where the information was made or obtained by that or any other person by reason of being, or having been, a 'Commonwealth officer'<sup>2</sup> or otherwise engaged to perform work for a Commonwealth entity.<sup>3</sup>

1.7 Proposed subsections 122.1(3)-(4) would also criminalise removing or holding 'inherently harmful information' outside a proper place of custody and failing to comply with a lawful direction regarding the retention, use or disposal of such information. These proposed offences carry a maximum term of imprisonment of between 5 to 15 years.

1.8 'Inherently harmful information' is defined to include:

- security classified information;<sup>4</sup>
- information the communication of which would, or could reasonably be expected to, damage the security or defence of Australia;
- information that was obtained by, or made by or on behalf of, a domestic intelligence agency or a foreign intelligence agency in connection with the agency's functions;
- information that was provided by a person to the Commonwealth or an authority of the Commonwealth in order to comply with an obligation under a law or otherwise by compulsion of law;
- information relating to the operations, capabilities or technologies of, or methods or sources used by, a domestic or foreign law enforcement agency.<sup>5</sup>

2 'Commonwealth officer' would be defined broadly to include (a) an APS employee; (b) an individual appointed or employed by the Commonwealth otherwise than under the Public Service Act 1999; (c) a member of the Australian Defence Force; (d) a member or special member of the Australian Federal Police; (e) an officer or employee of a Commonwealth authority; (f) an individual who is a contracted service provider for a Commonwealth contract: Proposed section 121.1 of the Criminal Code.

3 Under proposed subsection 90.1(1) of the Criminal Code a person 'deals' with information if the person receives or obtains it; collects it; possesses it; makes a record of it; copies it alters it; conceals it; communicates it; publishes it; or makes it available.

4 Strict liability applies to the element of the offence of whether the information is inherently harmful to the extent the information is security classified information: See, proposed subsection 122.1(4) and (5) of the Criminal Code.

5 See, proposed section 121.1 of the Criminal Code.

Offences of conduct causing harm to Australia's interests

1.9 Under proposed section 122.2 of the Criminal Code it is an offence for a person to communicate, deal with or remove or hold information (outside a proper place of custody) where this conduct causes, or is likely to cause, harm to Australia's interests and the information was made or obtained by the person, or any other person, by reason of being, or having been, a 'Commonwealth officer'<sup>6</sup> or otherwise engaged to perform work for a Commonwealth entity. These offences carry maximum penalties of between 5 and 15 years imprisonment.

Aggravated offences

1.10 In relation to the offences under sections 122.1 and 122.2, proposed section 122.3 of the Criminal Code would introduce an aggravated offence where additional circumstances apply.<sup>7</sup> These aggravated offences carry a maximum penalty of between 10 and 20 years imprisonment.

Unauthorised disclosure by Commonwealth officers and former Commonwealth officers

1.11 Proposed section 122.4 of the Criminal Code provides that a person commits an offence if they communicate information which they are required under Commonwealth law not to disclose where the information was made or obtained by reason of the person being, or having been, a Commonwealth officer or otherwise engaged to perform work for a Commonwealth entity.

Defences

1.12 Proposed section 122.5 of the Criminal Code provides for a number of defences to each of the offences in proposed sections 122.1-122.4 including where:

- the person was exercising a power or performing a function or duty in their capacity as a Commonwealth officer or someone otherwise engaged to perform work for a Commonwealth entity;
- the person acted in accordance with an agreement or arrangement to which the Commonwealth was a party;
- the information is already public with the authority of the Commonwealth;

6 See, proposed section 121.1 of the Criminal Code.

7 This includes where the information in relation to the offence has a security classification of 'secret' or above; the record containing the information is marked 'for Australian eyes only' or as prescribed by regulation; the offence involves 5 or more records with a security classification; the offence involves the person altering a record to remove its security classification; or at the time the person committed the offence the person held an Australian Government security clearance. Strict liability applies as to whether 5 or more documents had a security classification.

- the information is communicated to the Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security, the Commonwealth Ombudsman, the Enforcement Integrity Commissioner or their staff for the purpose of performing a function or duty;
- the information is communicated in accordance with the Public Interest Disclosure Act 2013;
- the information is communicated to a court or tribunal;
- the information is dealt with or held in the 'public interest'<sup>8</sup> in the person's capacity as a journalist for the purposes of fair and accurate reporting;
- the information has been previously published and the person has reasonable grounds for believing that the communication will not cause harm to Australia's interests or the security or defence of Australia; and
- the person has reasonable grounds for believing that making or obtaining the information was required or authorised by Australian law and it is communicated to the person to whom the information relates or with the express or implied consent of the person.

1.13 The defendant bears an evidential burden in relation to these defences.

Compatibility of the measures with the right to freedom of expression

1.14 The right to freedom of expression requires the state not to arbitrarily interfere with freedom of expression, particularly restrictions on political debate. By criminalising the disclosure of information as well as particular forms of use, the proposed secrecy provisions engage and limit the right to freedom of expression.

1.15 The committee has previously examined the secrecy provisions now contained in the Australian Border Force Act 2015 (Border Force Act) and assessed that they may be incompatible with the right to freedom of expression.<sup>9</sup> The measures proposed in the bill raise similar concerns in relation to freedom of expression but appear to be broader in scope than those now contained in the Border Force Act. It is noted that concerns have also previously been raised by United Nations (UN) supervisory mechanisms about the chilling effect of Australian secrecy provisions on freedom of expression.<sup>10</sup> The type of concerns raised, including that civil society organisations, whistle-blowers, trade unionists, teachers, social workers, health professionals and lawyers may face criminal charges 'for speaking out and denouncing the violations' of the rights of individuals appear to apply equally in respect of the measures in this bill.<sup>11</sup>

1.16 Measures limiting the right to freedom of expression may be permissible where the measures pursue a legitimate objective, are rationally connected to that objective, and are a proportionate way to achieve that objective.<sup>12</sup>

1.17 The statement of compatibility acknowledges that the measures engage and limit the right to freedom of expression but argues that such limitations are permissible.<sup>13</sup> In relation to the objective of the bill, the statement of compatibility states:

The objective of the Bill is to modernise and strengthen Australia's espionage, foreign interference, secrecy and related laws to ensure the protection of Australia's security and Australian interests. Foreign actors are currently seeking to harm Australian interests on an unprecedented scale, posing a grave threat to Australia's sovereignty, prosperity and national security. This threat is a substantial concern for the Australian Government. If left unchecked, espionage and foreign interference activities may diminish public confidence in the integrity of political and government institutions, compromise Australia's military capabilities and alliance relationships, and undercut economic and business interests within Australia and overseas.

1.18 While generally these matters are capable of constituting legitimate objectives for the purposes of international human rights law, it would have been useful if the statement of compatibility had provided information as to the importance of these objectives in the context of the specific secrecy measures.

1.19 The statement of compatibility provides limited information as to whether the limitations imposed by the measures are rationally connected to (that is, effective to achieve) these stated objectives.

1.20 In relation to the proportionality of the measures, the statement of compatibility refers to UN Human Rights Committee General Comment No. 34 on the right to freedom of expression which says that state parties must ensure that secrecy laws are crafted so as to constitute permissible limitations on human rights. The UN Human Rights Committee noted in General Comment No 34 that it is not a permissible limitation on the right to freedom of expression, for example:

12 See, generally, Human Rights Committee, General comment No 34 (Article 19: Freedoms of opinion and expression), CCPR/C/GC/34, [21]-[36] (2011). The right to freedom of expression may be subject to limitations that are necessary to protect the rights or reputations of others, national security, public order, or public health or morals.

13 Statement of compatibility (SOC) pp. 22-23.

...to invoke such [secrecy] laws to suppress or withhold from the public information of legitimate public interest that does not harm national security or to prosecute journalists, researchers, environmental activists, human rights defenders, or others, for having disseminated such information. Nor is it generally appropriate to include in the remit of such laws such categories of information as those relating to the commercial sector, banking and scientific progress.<sup>14</sup>

1.21 However, it appears that, as drafted, the proposed measures in question may give rise to just such concerns.

Breadth and scope of information

1.22 While the statement of compatibility states that the 'offences in section 122.1 apply only to information within narrowly defined categories of inherently harmful information', it is unclear that these categories are sufficiently circumscribed in respect of the stated objectives of the measures to meet this description. Rather than being 'narrowly defined' the definition of 'inherently harmful information', to which the offences under proposed section 122.1 apply, appears to be very broad.

1.23 As set out above at [1.8], 'inherently harmful information' is defined to include security classified information; information expected to prejudice security, defence or international relations of Australia; information from a domestic intelligence agency or a foreign intelligence agency; information that was provided by a person to the Commonwealth to comply with an obligation under a law, as well as a range of other matters. The breadth of the current and possible definitions therefore raises concerns as to whether the limitation is proportionate.

1.24 For example, the category of 'security classified information' is to be defined by regulation<sup>15</sup> and may potentially apply to a broad range of government documents. In this respect, the Australian government Information security management guidelines set out when government information is or should be marked as security classified and indicate that the scope of the documents captured by security classifications is likely to be broad.<sup>16</sup>

16 See, Australian Government, Information security management guidelines Australian Government security classification system (April 2015) <https://www.protectivesecurity.gov.au/informationsecurity/Documents/INFOSECGuidelinesAustralianGovernmentSecurityClassificationSystem.pdf>.

1.25 Further, the explanatory memorandum acknowledges that the category of any information provided by a person to the Commonwealth to comply with another law is wide. It explains that this category would include information required to be provided to regulatory agencies, by carriage services and Commonwealth authorities. While the statement of compatibility refers generally to the 'gravity of the threat posed' by these categories, it is unclear whether each category of 'inherently harmful information' is necessary to achieve the stated objective of the measures. It appears that some of the categories could capture the communication of information that is not harmful or not significantly harmful to Australia's national interests or not intended to cause harm. This raises a concern that the measure may not be the least rights restrictive way of achieving its stated objectives and may be overly broad.

1.26 The proposed offences in section 122.2 relating to communicating, dealing with or removing or holding information where this conduct causes, or is likely to cause, harm to Australia's interests also applies to a potentially broad range of information.<sup>17</sup> The definition of information that 'causes harm to Australia's interests' is very broad and includes categories that appear less harmful. For example, it includes interfering with any process concerning breach of a Commonwealth law that has a civil penalty. As civil penalty provisions relate to civil processes, the imposition of a criminal sanction for an unauthorised disclosure of information appears to be serious. It would capture interfering with, for example, the investigation of relatively minor conduct such as failing to return an identity card as soon as practicable (which carries a maximum penalty of 1 penalty unit or $210)<sup>18</sup> or providing a community radio broadcasting service without a licence (which carries a maximum penalty of 50 penalty units or $10,500).<sup>19</sup> It is unclear that the level of harm is sufficiently connected to the stated objective of the measure. Accordingly, it appears proposed

17 See, proposed section 121.1 of the Criminal Code: 'cause harm to Australia's interests' includes 'interfere with or prejudice the prevention, detection, investigation, prosecution or punishment of: (i) a criminal offence against; or (ii) a contravention of a provision, that is subject to a civil penalty, of: a law of the Commonwealth; or (b) interfere with or prejudice the performance of functions of the Australian Federal Police under: (i) paragraph 8(1)(be) of the Australian Federal Police Act 9 1979 (protective and custodial functions); or (ii) the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002; or (c) harm or prejudice Australia's international relations in relation to information that was communicated in confidence: (i) by, or on behalf of, the government of a foreign country, an authority of the government of a foreign country or an international organisation; and (ii) to the Government of the Commonwealth, to an authority of the Commonwealth, or to a person receiving the communication on behalf of the Commonwealth or an authority of the Commonwealth; or (d) harm or prejudice Australia's international relations in any other way; or (e) harm or prejudice relations between the Commonwealth and a State or Territory; or (f) harm or prejudice the health or safety of the public or a section of the public.

section 122.2 and the categories of harm to Australia's interests may also be overly broad with respect to the stated objective of the measures.

1.27 As set out above, proposed section 122.4 of the Criminal Code criminalises unauthorised disclosures of information by former and current Commonwealth officers where they were under a duty not to disclose. The statement of compatibility states that this provision is a modernised version of current section 70 of the Crimes Act and as such 'section 122.4 does not establish a new limitation on the ability of such persons to communicate information'.<sup>20</sup> However, while proposed section 122.4 is similar to current section 70 of the Crimes Act, this does not address human rights concerns with the proposed provision. The concerns about whether the section 122.4 offence is sufficiently circumscribed arise from there being no harm requirement and it potentially applying to any information a person has learnt while engaged by the Commonwealth regardless of its nature. Further, the breadth of any 'duty not to disclose' is potentially broad as it arises under any law of the Commonwealth. This accordingly raises concerns that section 122.4 may be overly broad with respect to the stated objective of the measures.

1.28 More generally, the breadth of the information subject to these offences would appear to also capture even government information that is not likely to be harmful to Australia's national interests. It is likely to also capture a range of information the disclosure of which may be considered in the public interest or may merely be inconvenient. This raises serious questions about whether the limitation on the right to freedom of expression is proportionate. As noted by the UN Special Rapporteur on the right to freedom of expression '[i]t is not legitimate to limit disclosure in order to protect against embarrassment or exposure of wrongdoing, or to conceal the functioning of an institution'.<sup>21</sup>

Breadth and scope of application

1.29 The classes of people to which the offences in proposed sections 122.1-122.4 applies are extremely broad and these sections could criminalise expression on a broad range of matters by a broad range of people, including Australian Public Service employees; members of the Australian Defence Force and the Australian Federal Police; people providing services to government; contractors performing services for the government such as social workers, teachers, medical professionals or lawyers.

1.30 The proposed offences in section 122.1-122.3 go further than this and do not merely cover the conduct of those who are, or have been, engaged or employed in some manner by the Commonwealth government. They would also criminalise the conduct of anyone (in other words, 'outsiders') who communicates, receives, obtains or publishes the categories of government information described above at [1.22]–[1.26].

1.31 For example, it would appear that a journalist who deals with (which is defined very broadly to include 'receives') unsolicited security classified information made by a Commonwealth employee would commit a criminal offence under section 122.1.<sup>22</sup> It is possible that the defence that the information is dealt with or held in the 'public interest' in the person's capacity as a journalist engaged in fair and accurate reporting could potentially be available. However, if the receipt of the information was not in the 'public interest'<sup>23</sup> because, for example, it is likely to harm the health or safety of a section of the public then the defence would appear not to apply. Further, the defence also requires that the journalist is engaged in 'fair and accurate reporting' such that there may be a range of circumstances where it does not apply. This is notwithstanding that the receipt of the information in question may be unsolicited and the journalist may or may not be aware of the security classification.<sup>24</sup> It also raises a related concern that the measure, as drafted, could apply to the mere receipt of information regardless of what the journalist (for example) does with the information afterwards. This raises a particular concern that the offence provisions in section 122.1 could have a chilling effect on reporting and that the defences may act as an insufficient safeguard in relation to the right to freedom of expression.

1.32 More generally, where the 'inherently harmful information' is not already publicly available and the person is not a journalist, it appears that by dealing with information the person may be guilty of an offence under section 122.1 even where they have not solicited such information or are unaware that it is, for example, subject to a security classification. Proposed sections 122.1-122.3 would also appear to capture professional conduct by advisers such as lawyers who may be asked to advise whether a person would commit an offence. For example, it would appear to constitute an offence for a lawyer to make a photocopy of a security classified document which a client has received for the purposes of providing the client with legal advice about whether they can disclose or publish the document. It would also appear to be a criminal offence, if the lawyer were to merely receive or make a record of the document in this context. There does not appear to be an applicable defence in relation to such conduct.

22 Under proposed subsection 90.1(1) of the Criminal Code a person 'deals' with information if the person receives or obtains it; collects it; possesses it; makes a record of it; copies it; alters it; conceals it; communicates it; publishes it; or makes it available.

23 Proposed section 122.5(7) provides that, dealing with or holding information is not in the public interest if (a) dealing with or holding information that would be an offence under section 92 of the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation Act 1979 (publication of identity of ASIO employee or ASIO affiliate); (b) dealing with or holding information that would be an offence under section 41 of the Intelligence Services Act 2001 (publication of identity of staff); (c) dealing with or holding information that would be an offence under section 22, 22A or 22B of the Witness Protection Act 1994 (offences relating to Commonwealth, Territory, State participants); (d) dealing with or holding information that will or is likely to harm or prejudice the health or safety of the public or a section of the public.

24 Strict liability applies to the element of the offence of whether the information is inherently harmful to the extent the information is security classified information: See, proposed subsection 122.1(4) and (5) of the Criminal Code.

1.33 Indeed, there are serious questions about whether the proposed statutory defences provide adequate safeguards in respect of the right to freedom of expression. For example, in addition to the matters raised above, the defences may not sufficiently protect disclosure of information that may be in the public interest or in aid of government accountability and oversight so as to be a proportionate limit on human rights. While there is a defence where information was disclosed in accordance with the Public Interest Disclosure Act 2013 (PIO Act), it is unclear that this would provide adequate protection. The UN Special Rapporteur on human rights defenders has recently urged the government to 'substantially strengthen the Public Interest Disclosure framework to ensure effective protection to whistleblowers',<sup>25</sup> noting that 'many potential whistleblowers will not take the risk of disclosing because of the complexity of the laws, severity and scope of the penalty, and extremely hostile approach by the Government and media to whistleblowers'.<sup>26</sup> There is no general public interest defence in relation to the proposed measures. There are questions as to whether some of the defences such as those contained in sections 122.5(3) and (4) extend to preparatory acts such as printing or photocopying.

1.34 Further, the penalties for the offences in schedule 2 of the bill are serious and range from 2 to 20 years. The severity of such penalties is also relevant to whether the limitation on the right to freedom of expression is proportionate. Finally, it is unclear how the proposed provisions will interact with existing secrecy provisions such as, for example, under the Border Force Act. In this respect, as noted above, the proposed measures appear to capture a much broader range of conduct than that currently prohibited under the Border Force Act.

1.36 The preceding analysis raises questions about whether the measures are compatible with this right.

1.37 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the Attorney-General as to:

- how the measures are effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) the stated objectives of the bill;
- whether the limitations are reasonable and proportionate to achieve the stated objective (including in relation to the breadth of information subject to secrecy provisions, the adequacy of safeguards and the severity of criminal penalties); and
- how the measures will interact with existing secrecy provisions such as those under the Border Force Act which has been previously considered by the committee.

1.38 In relation to the proportionality of the measures, in light of the information requested above, if it is intended that the proposed secrecy provisions in schedule 2 proceed, advice is also sought as to whether it would be feasible to amend them to:

- appropriately circumscribe the range of 'inherently harmful information' to which the offence in proposed section 122.1 applies;
- appropriately circumscribe the definition of what information 'causes harm to Australia's interests' for the purposes of section 122.2;
- appropriately circumscribe the definition of 'deals' with information for the purposes of offences under proposed sections 122.1-122.4;
- appropriately circumscribe the scope of information subject to the prohibition on disclosure under proposed section 122.4 (by, for example, introducing a harm element);
- limit the offences in schedule 2 to persons who are or have been engaged by the Commonwealth as an employee or contractor;
- expand the scope of safeguards and defences (including, for example, a general 'public interest' defence, an unsolicited information defence, a broader journalism defence, and the provision of legal advice defence);
- reduce the severity of the penalties which apply; and
- include a sunset clause in relation to the secrecy provisions in schedule 2.

Compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy

1.40 The right to an effective remedy requires states parties to ensure a right to an effective remedy for violations of human rights. The prohibition on disclosing information may also affect human rights violations coming to light and being addressed as required by the right to an effective remedy. That is, the prohibition on disclosing information may adversely affect the ability of individual members of the public to know about possible violations of rights and seek redress. The engagement of this right was not addressed in the statement of compatibility and accordingly no assessment was provided about this issue.

Committee comment

1.41 The preceding analysis raises questions about whether the measure is compatible with the right to an effective remedy. This right was not addressed in the statement of compatibility.

1.42 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the Attorney-General as to whether the measure is compatible with the right to an effective remedy.

Compatibility of the measure with the right to be presumed innocent

1.44 Article 14(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) protects the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law. The right to be presumed innocent usually requires that the prosecution prove each element of the offence (including fault elements and physical elements).

1.45 Strict liability offences engage and limit the right to be presumed innocent as they allow for the imposition of criminal liability without the need for the prosecution to prove fault. In the case of a strict liability offence, the prosecution is only required to prove the physical elements of the offence. The defence of honest and reasonable mistake of fact is, however, available to the defendant. Strict liability may be applied to whole offences or to elements of offences.

1.46 An offence provision which requires the defendant to carry an evidential or legal burden of proof (commonly referred to as 'a reverse burden') with regard to the existence of some fact also engages and limits the presumption of innocence. This is because a defendant's failure to discharge the burden of proof may permit their conviction despite reasonable doubt as to their guilt. Where a statutory exception, defence or excuse to an offence is provided in legislation, these defences or exceptions may effectively reverse the burden of proof and must be considered as part of a contextual and substantive assessment of potential limitations on the right to be presumed innocent in the context of an offence provision.

1.47 Reverse burden and strict liability offences will not necessarily be inconsistent with the presumption of innocence provided that they are within reasonable limits which take into account the importance of the objective being sought and maintain the defendant's right to a defence. In other words, such provisions must pursue a legitimate objective, be rationally connected to that objective and be a proportionate means of achieving that objective.

Strict liability element

1.48 As outlined above, strict liability applies to the element of the offence in proposed section 122.1 that the information dealt with or communicated is 'inherently harmful information' to the extent that the information is security classified information. The statement of compatibility acknowledges that this measure engages and may limit the right to be presumed innocent but argues that this limitation is permissible.<sup>27</sup> It states that this is 'appropriate' as 'information or articles are clearly marked with the security classification and any person who has access to security classified information should easily be able to identify as such'.<sup>28</sup>

1.49 However, it is unclear from the information provided whether there could be circumstances where a security classification marking has been removed but the substance of the document is still security classified. It may also be difficult for persons who are not Commonwealth employees to ascertain whether or not a particular marking on a government document held a 'security classification'. The statement of compatibility confirms that the strict liability element means a person cannot avoid liability if they were unaware the information was security classified, but argues that requiring knowledge would undermine the deterrence effect of the offence.<sup>29</sup> The statement of compatibility further notes that the general defence of mistake of fact as set out in section 9.2 of the Criminal Code would apply. While this is relevant to the proportionality of the limitation, to rely on this defence a person must hold a reasonable belief that the information is not security classified. This is a much narrower defence than would otherwise apply.

1.50 Further, there is a concern that the application of a strict liability element to whether information had a 'security classification' means that a person may be found guilty of an offence even where it was not appropriate that the information in question had a security classification. That is, there may be circumstances where information has a security classification which was not appropriately applied or alternatively is no longer appropriate. As such, it does not appear that an inappropriate security classification would be a matter that a court could consider in determining whether a person had committed an offence under proposed section 122.1.

1.51 While the explanatory memorandum argues that the government 'has well-established practices for determining whether particular classified information has been properly security classified',<sup>30</sup> it is unclear whether this is a sufficient safeguard in the context of the strict liability element. In contrast, while the current secrecy provisions in the Border Force Act raise human rights concerns, there potentially exists a relevant safeguard in respect of an offence of disclosing security classified information. Section 50A of the Border Force Act provides that a prosecution must not be initiated unless the secretary has certified that it is appropriate that the information had a security classification at the time of the conduct.<sup>31</sup> While this does not fully address human rights concerns, to the extent that it requires the secretary to certify that the substance of the information was appropriately classified, it would appear to constitute a relevant safeguard. As noted above, it is also unclear how these proposed offences will interact with existing agency specific secrecy offences.

Reverse burden offences

1.52 As set out above, proposed section 122.5 provides offence-specific defences to the offences in sections 122.1-122.4. In doing so, the provisions reverse the evidential burden of proof as subsection 13.3(3) of the Criminal Code provides that a defendant who wishes to rely on any exception, exemption, excuse, qualification or justification bears an evidential burden in relation to that matter.

1.53 The explanatory memorandum and statement of compatibility include some information about the reverse evidential burden. However, the justification for reversing the evidential burden of proof is generally that the defendant 'should be readily able to point to' the relevant evidence<sup>32</sup> or the defendant is 'best placed' to know of the relevant evidence.<sup>33</sup> However, this does not appear to be sufficient to constitute a proportionate limitation on human rights. It is unclear that reversing the evidential burden is necessary as opposed to including additional elements within the offence provisions themselves.

1.54 In this respect, proposed section 122.1 appears to be framed broadly to potentially make the work that any Commonwealth officer or engaged contractor

30 EM, p. 229.

31 Under section 42 of the Australian Border Force Act it is an offence to disclose categories of information including information which has a security clearance. Section 50A provides that if an offence against section 42 relates to information that has a security classification, a prosecution must not be initiated 'unless the Secretary has certified that it is appropriate that the information had a security classification at the time of the conduct'.

32 See EM pp. 276-283.

does when dealing with security classified information an offence. It is a defence to prosecution of this offence, if a person is acting in their capacity as a Commonwealth officer. However, the effect of this would appear to leave officers or contractors acting appropriately in the course of their duties open to a criminal charge and then place the evidential burden of proof on them to raise evidence to demonstrate that they were in fact acting in accordance with their employment. This raises questions as to whether the current construction of the offence, with the reverse evidential burden in the statutory defence, is a proportionate limitation on the right to be presumed innocent.

1.55 Indeed, it appears in some circumstances, it would be very difficult for Commonwealth officers to discharge the evidential burden. For example, the Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security (IGIS) explains that if a current or former IGIS officer was charged under proposed section 122 of the Criminal Code 'it would, for all practical purposes, be impossible for them to discharge the evidential burden of proving that the alleged dealing with or communication of information contrary to the proposed offences was undertaken in the course of their duties'. This is because they would 'potentially commit an offence under s 34(1) of the [Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security Act 1986] by disclosing that information in their defence at trial, or providing it to law enforcement officials investigating the potential commission of an offence'.<sup>34</sup>

Committee comment

1.56 The preceding analysis raises questions as to the compatibility of the reverse burden offences and a strict liability element of an offence with the right to be presumed innocent.

1.57 In relation to the strict liability which applies to the element of the offence in proposed section 122.1, the committee therefore requests the advice of the Attorney-General as to:

- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve a legitimate objective (including the scope of application to persons who may not be aware of the security classification; the ability of courts to consider whether a security classification is inappropriate; and any safeguards); and
- if the measure proceeds, whether it would be feasible to amend proposed section 122.1 to provide a prosecution must not be initiated or continued unless it is appropriate that the substance of the information had a security classification at the time of the conduct.

34 See, Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security, Submission 13, Parliamentary Joint Committee on Intelligence and Security inquiry into the National Security Legislation Amendment (Espionage and Foreign Interference) Bill 2017 pp. 5-6.

1.58 In relation to the reverse evidential burdens, the committee requests the advice of the Attorney-General as to:

- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve the stated objective (including why the reverse evidential burdens are necessary and the scope of conduct caught by the offence provisions);
- whether there are existing secrecy provisions that would prevent a defendant raising a defence and discharging the evidential burden, and if so, whether this is proportionate to the stated objective; and
- whether it would be feasible to amend the measures so that the relevant matters (currently in defences) are included as elements of the offence or alternatively, to provide that despite section 13.3 of the Criminal Code, a defendant does not bear an evidential (or legal) burden of proof in relying on the offence-specific defences.

1.59 Mr Leeser deliberately did not participate in consideration of this report entry as he wished to reserve his position pending further consideration of the bill by the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Intelligence and Security, of which he is also a member.

Offences relating to espionage

1.60 Schedule 1 of the bill seeks to amend a number of offences in the Criminal Code including those relating to foreign actors and persons who act on their behalf against Australia's interests.

1.61 While the Criminal Code currently contains espionage offences, schedule 1 would create a broader range of new espionage offences.<sup>35</sup> The new offences would criminalise a broad range of dealings with information, including both classified and unclassified information, including making it an offence:<sup>36</sup>

- to deal with (including to possess or receive)<sup>37</sup> information or an article that has a security classification<sup>38</sup> or concerns Australia's national security where the person intends, or is reckless as to whether, the conduct will prejudice

36 EM, p. 26.

37 Under proposed subsection 90.1(1) a person deals with information or an article if the person: (a) receives or obtains it; (b) collects it; (c) possesses it; (d) makes a record of it; (e) copies it; (f) alters it; (g) conceals it; (h) communicates it; (i) publishes it; (j) makes it available.

38 'Security classification' is to have the meaning prescribed by regulation: Proposed section 90.5.

Australia's national security or advantage the national security<sup>39</sup> of a foreign country and the conduct results or will result in the information or article being made available to a foreign principal<sup>40</sup> or someone acting on behalf of a foreign principal.<sup>41</sup>

- to deal with information, even where it does not have a security classification or concern Australia's national security, where the person intends, or is reckless as to whether, the conduct will prejudice Australia's national security where the conduct results or will result in the information or article being made available to a foreign principal or someone acting on behalf of a foreign principal.<sup>42</sup>
- to deal with information or an article which has a security classification or concerns Australia's national security where the conduct results or will result in the information or article being made available to a foreign principal or someone acting on behalf of the foreign principal.<sup>43</sup>

1.62 In addition to these new espionage offences, it would be an offence:

- to engage in espionage<sup>44</sup> on behalf of a foreign principal;<sup>45</sup>
- to solicit or procure a person to engage in espionage;<sup>46</sup>

39 Proposed section 90.4 defines 'national security' of Australia or a foreign country as (a) the defence of the country; (b) the protection of the country or any part of it, or the people of the country or any part of it, from defined activities (espionage; sabotage; terrorism; political violence; activities intended and likely to obstruct, hinder or interfere with the performance of the defence force; foreign interference); (c) the protection of the integrity of the country's territory and borders from serious threats; (d) the carrying out of the country's responsibilities to any other country in relation to the matter mentioned in paragraph (c) or a defined activity; (e) the country's political, military or economic relations with another country or other countries.

40 Proposed section 90.2 of the Criminal Code defines 'foreign principal' as: (a) a foreign government principal; (b) a public international organisation (c) a terrorist organisation (d) an entity or organisation owned, directed or controlled by a foreign principal within the meaning of paragraph (b) or (c); (e) an entity or organisation owned, directed or controlled by 2 or more foreign principals.

- to prepare or plan for an offence of espionage.<sup>47</sup>

1.63 These offences carry a maximum penalty of between 20 years and life imprisonment. The bill contains a number of limited defences to the offences.<sup>48</sup>

Compatibility of the measures with the right to freedom of expression

1.64 By criminalising disclosure and use of information in particular circumstances, the measures engage and limit the right to freedom of expression. The statement of compatibility does not expressly acknowledge that the proposed espionage offences engage and limit this right and accordingly does not provide a full assessment of whether the limitation is permissible.

1.65 The objective of the bill identified above, summarised as protecting Australia's security and Australian interests, is likely to be capable of being a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law. However, it is unclear from the information provided whether these specific measures are rationally connected and proportionate to that objective.

1.66 For a measure to be a proportionate limitation on the right to freedom of expression it must be sufficiently circumscribed. In this respect, it appears that the offences as drafted capture a very broad range of conduct. For example, under the offence of dealing with security classified information under proposed section 91.3, it appears that a journalist, by publishing any information subject to a security classification online, will commit an offence. This is because online publication would necessarily make the information available to a foreign principal. Noting that a large number of government documents may be defined as security classified,<sup>49</sup> the extent of the limitation on the right to freedom of expression imposed by these offences is extensive.

1.67 Further, it would appear to still be an offence for a journalist in the above example even if the information were unclassified if it concerned 'Australia's national security'. The concept of 'national security'<sup>50</sup> in the bill is very broadly defined so that reporting on a range of matters of public significance may be captured including, for example, political, military or economic relations with another country. There do not appear to be any applicable defences available unless the materials were already in the public domain with the Commonwealth's authorisation.<sup>51</sup> Indeed, the proposed offence under section 91.3 applies without any requirement of intention to harm and without any requirement that the person has in mind a particular foreign principal or principals.

47 Proposed section 91.12. This section defines 'espionage' by reference to offences in Division A, sections 91.1, 91.2, 91.3, 91.6 and Division B, section 91.8.

48 See, proposed sections 91.4, 91.9, 91.13. For example, it is a defence where the person dealt with the information or article in accordance with Commonwealth law; the person acted in accordance with an agreement or arrangement to which the Commonwealth was a party; the information is already public with the authority of the Commonwealth.

49 'Security classification' is to have the meaning prescribed by regulation: Proposed 90.5.

1.68 It also appears that these offences may capture the conduct of civil society organisations. For example, if a civil society organisation disclosed unclassified information it had received from a whistleblower to UN bodies, international non-government organisations or foreign governments about, for example, Australia's human rights record, this would appear to be covered by the proposed offence under section 91.3. This is because such information could affect Australia's relations with a foreign country or countries and it would accordingly fall within the definition of 'concerning Australia's national security'. Under the proposed provisions, which make it an offence to deal with information concerning Australia's 'national security' and where that information is made available to foreign principals, there does not appear to be an applicable defence for civil society organisations available unless the information has already been made public with the authorisation of the Commonwealth.

1.69 As such, this raises concerns that the offences as drafted may be overly broad with respect to their stated objective. It is also unclear from the statement of compatibility whether there are adequate and effective safeguards, including relevant defences, to ensure the limitation on the right to freedom of expression is proportionate.

Committee comment

1.70 The measures engage and limit the right to freedom of expression.

1.71 The preceding analysis raises questions about whether the measures are compatible with this right.

50 Proposed section 90.4 defines 'national security' of Australia or a foreign country as (a) the defence of the country; (b) the protection of the country or any part of it, or the people of the country or any part of it, from defined activities (espionage; sabotage; terrorism; political violence; activities intended and likely to obstruct, hinder or interfere with the performance of the defence force, foreign interference); (c) the protection of the integrity of the country's territory and borders from serious threats; (d) the carrying out of the country's responsibilities to any other country in relation to the matter mentioned in paragraph (c) or a defined activity; (e) the country's political, military or economic relations with another country or other countries.

51 See proposed section 91.4 of the Criminal Code.

1.72 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the Attorney-General as to:

- how the measures are effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) the stated objectives of the bill; and
- whether the limitations are reasonable and proportionate to achieve the stated objective (including in relation to the breadth and types of information subject to espionage provisions, the scope of the definition of 'national security' and the adequacy of safeguards).

1.73 In light of the information requested above, if it is intended that the espionage offences proceed, advice is also sought as to whether it would be feasible to amend them to:

- appropriately circumscribe the range of information to which the offences apply;
- appropriately circumscribe the definition of what information concerns 'Australia's national interests' where making such information available to a foreign national would constitute a criminal offence;
- appropriately circumscribe the definition of 'deals' with information for the purposes of espionage offences under proposed sections 91.1-91.13;
- appropriately circumscribe the scope of conduct covered by proposed section 91.3 (by, for example, introducing a harm element);
- expand the scope of safeguards and defences; and
- include a sunset clause in relation to the espionage provisions in schedule 1.

1.74 Mr Leeser deliberately did not participate in consideration of this report entry as he wished to reserve his position pending further consideration of the bill by the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Intelligence and Security, of which he is also a member.

Compatibility of the measure with the right to be presumed innocent

1.75 As noted above, strict liability offences engage and limit the right to be presumed innocent as they allow for the imposition of criminal liability without the need for the prosecution to prove fault. Strict liability applies to the element of the offence that the information is security classified information.

1.76 Consistently with the concerns in relation to the above strict liability offence (see [1.44] – [1.51]), it is unclear from the information provided whether there could be circumstances where a security classification marking has been removed but the substance of the document is still security classified. It may also be difficult for persons who are not Commonwealth employees to ascertain whether or not a particular marking on a government document held a 'security classification'.

1.77 Further, there is a concern that the application of a strict liability element to whether information had a 'security classification' means that a person may be found guilty of an offence even where it was not appropriate that the information in question had a security classification. That is, there may be circumstances where information has a security classification which was not appropriately applied or is no longer appropriate.

Committee comment

1.78 The preceding analysis raises questions as to the compatibility of the strict liability element of the offences in proposed sections 91.1 and 91.3 with the right to be presumed innocent.

1.79 The committee therefore requests the advice of the Attorney-General as to whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve a legitimate objective (including the scope of application to persons who may not be aware of the security classification; the ability of courts to consider whether a security classification is inappropriate; and any safeguards).

1.80 Mr Leeser deliberately did not participate in consideration of this report entry as he wished to reserve his position pending further consideration of the bill by the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Intelligence and Security, of which he is also a member.

Compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy

1.81 As noted above, the right to an effective remedy requires states parties to ensure a right to an effective remedy for violations of human rights. The breadth of the proposed offence could also affect human rights violations coming to light and being addressed as required by the right to an effective remedy. The engagement of this right was not addressed in the statement of compatibility and accordingly no assessment was provided about this issue.

Committee comment

1.82 The preceding analysis raises questions about whether the measure is compatible with the right to an effective remedy. This right was not addressed in the statement of compatibility.

1.83 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the Attorney-General as to whether the measure is compatible with the right to an effective remedy.

1.84 Mr Leeser deliberately did not participate in consideration of this report entry as he wished to reserve his position pending further consideration of the bill by the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Intelligence and Security, of which he is also a member.

Foreign interference offences

1.85 Schedule 1 of the bill introduces new offences relating to foreign interference. The proposed offences would apply where a person's conduct is covert or deceptive, involves threats or menaces or involves a failure to disclose particular connections with a foreign principal or involves preparing for an offence.<sup>52</sup> For example, the offences of foreign interference involving 'targeted persons' provides:

- that a person engages in conduct on behalf of or in collaboration with a foreign principal, or a person acting on behalf of a foreign principal, where the conduct is directed, funded or supervised by a foreign principal (or person acting on their behalf) and the person intends or is reckless as to whether the conduct influences another person (the target) in relation to:
  - a political or government process of the Commonwealth or state or territory; or
  - the target's exercise of an Australian democratic or political right or duty; in circumstances where the person conceals from, or fails to disclose to, the target.<sup>53</sup>

1.86 Proposed sections 92.7 to 92.9 also criminalise the provision of support or funding to foreign intelligence agencies.

1.87 The foreign interference offences each carry a maximum term of imprisonment of between 10 and 15 years.<sup>54</sup> The bill contains a number of limited defences to the offences.<sup>55</sup>

Compatibility of the measures with the right to freedom of expression

1.88 By criminalising types of conduct which influence another person, the measures engage and limit the right to freedom of expression. The statement of compatibility does not expressly acknowledge that the proposed foreign offences engage and limit this right and accordingly does not provide a full assessment of whether the limitation is permissible.

1.89 The objective of the bill identified above, summarised as protecting Australia's security and Australian interests, is likely to be capable of being a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law. However, as with the espionage offences discussed above, it is unclear from the information provided whether the measures are rationally connected and proportionate to that objective.

1.90 In relation to the proportionality of the limitation, aspects of the offences appear to be overly broad with respect to the stated objective of the measure. The offences appear to capture a very broad range of conduct, including conduct engaged in by civil society organisations. It is common for civil society organisations to work in collaboration to form international coalitions about campaigns or work with public international organisations. It is noted that public international organisations would fall within the definition of a 'foreign principal'.<sup>56</sup> Accordingly, in this context, if a member of an Australian civil society organisation were to lobby an Australian parliamentarian to adopt a particular policy in the context of a campaign this may constitute a criminal offence under proposed subsection 92.2(2) if the person fails to disclose that their organisation is, for example, collaborating with public international organisations. There do not appear to be any relevant defences to such conduct.<sup>57</sup> This also raises a concern that there appear to be insufficient safeguards, including relevant defences, to protect freedom of expression.

1.91 Further, the offences of providing support to a foreign intelligence agency appear to be very broad. For example, if 'support' were to be given its ordinary meaning, the offence could potentially cover the publication of a news article which reported positively about the activities of a foreign intelligence organisation. There do not appear to be any relevant defences in relation to this kind of conduct.<sup>58</sup>

1.92 The measures engage and limit the right to freedom of expression.

1.93 The preceding analysis raises questions about whether the measures impose a proportionate limit on this right.

58 Proposed section 92.11.

1.95 In light of the information requested above, if it is intended that the foreign interference offences proceed, advice is also sought as to whether it would be feasible to amend them to:

- appropriately circumscribe the range of conduct to which the offences apply;
- expand the scope of safeguards and defences; and
- include a sunset clause in relation to the foreign interference provisions in schedule 1.

1.96 Mr Leeser deliberately did not participate in consideration of this report entry as he wished to reserve his position pending further consideration of the bill by the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Intelligence and Security, of which he is also a member.

Presumption against bail

1.97 Section 15AA of the Crimes Act provides for a presumption against bail for persons charged with, or convicted of, certain Commonwealth offences unless exceptional circumstances exist. Schedule 1 would update references to offences and apply the presumption against bail to the proposed offences in Division 80 and 91 of the Criminal Code (urging violence, advocating terrorism, genocide, offences relating to espionage).<sup>59</sup> It would also apply the presumption against bail to the new foreign interference offences where it is alleged that the defendant's conduct involved making a threat to cause serious harm or a demand with menaces.<sup>60</sup>

Compatibility of the measure with the right to release pending trial

1.98 The right to liberty includes the right to release pending trial. Article 9(3) of the ICCPR provides that the 'general rule' for people awaiting trial is that they should not be detained in custody. The UN Human Rights Committee has stated on a number of occasions that pre-trial detention should remain the exception and that bail should be granted except in circumstances where the likelihood exists that, for example, the accused would abscond, tamper with evidence, influence witnesses or flee from the jurisdiction.<sup>61</sup> As the measure creates a presumption against bail it engages and limits this right.<sup>62</sup>

1.99 In relation to the presumption against bail, the statement of compatibility states:

The presumption against bail is appropriately reserved for serious offences recognising the need to balance the right to liberty and the protection of the community.<sup>63</sup>

1.100 The statement of compatibility accordingly identifies the objective of the presumption as 'the protection of the community.'<sup>64</sup> In a broad sense, incapacitation through imprisonment could be capable of addressing community protection, however, no specific information was provided in the statement of compatibility about whether the measure is rationally connected to (that is, effective to achieve) the stated objective. In particular, it would be relevant whether the offences to which the presumption applies create particular risks while a person is on bail.

1.101 The presumption against bail applies not only to those convicted of the defined offences, but also those who are accused and in respect of which there has been no determination of guilt. That is, while the objective identified in the statement of compatibility refers to 'community protection' it applies more broadly to those that are accused of particular offences.

1.102 In this respect, the presumption against bail goes further than requiring that bail authorities and courts consider particular criteria, risks or conditions in deciding whether to grant bail. It is not evident from the information provided that the balancing exercise that bail authorities and courts usually undertake in determining whether to grant bail would be insufficient to address the stated objective of 'community protection' or that courts would fail to consider the serious nature of an offence in determining whether to grant bail.<sup>65</sup> This raises a specific concern that the measure may not be the least rights restrictive alternative, reasonably available, as required for it to constitute a proportionate limit on human rights.

61 See, UN Human Rights Committee, Smantser v Belarus (1178/03); WBE v the Netherlands (432/90); Hill and Hill v Spain (526/93).

62 See, In the Matter of an Application for Bail by Isa Islam [2010] ACTSC 147 (19 November 2010): the ACT Supreme Court declared that a provision of the Bail Act 1992 (ACT) was inconsistent with the right to liberty under section 18 of the ACT Human Rights Act 2004 which required that a person awaiting trial not be detained in custody as a 'general rule'. Section 9C of the Bail Act required those accused of murder, certain drug offences and ancillary offences, to show 'exceptional circumstances' before having a normal assessment for bail undertaken.

64 SOC, p. 13.

65 See, Crimes Act 1914 section 15AB.

1.103 In relation to the proportionality of the measure, the statement of compatibility further states that:

For offences subject to a presumption against bail the accused will nevertheless be afforded [the] opportunity to rebut the presumption. Further, the granting or refusing of bail is not arbitrary, as it is determined by a court in accordance with the relevant rules and principles of criminal procedure.<sup>66</sup>

1.104 However, a presumption against bail fundamentally alters the starting point of an inquiry as to the grant of bail. That is, unless there is countervailing evidence, a person will be incarcerated pending trial. In this respect, the bill does not specify the threshold for rebutting this presumption, including what constitutes 'exceptional circumstances' to justify bail.

1.105 While bail may continue to be available in some circumstances, based on the information provided, it is unclear that the presumption against bail is a proportionate limitation on the right to release pending trial.<sup>67</sup> Relevantly, in the context of the Human Rights Act 2004 (ACT) (ACT HRA), the ACT Supreme Court considered whether a presumption against bail under section 9C of the Bail Act 1992 (ACT) (ACT Bail Act) was incompatible with section 18(5) of the ACT HRA. Section 18(5) of the ACT HRA relevantly provides that a person awaiting trial is not to be detained in custody as a general rule. However, section 9C of the ACT Bail Act contains a presumption against bail in respect of particular offences and requires those accused of murder, certain drug offences and ancillary offences, to show 'exceptional circumstances' before the usual assessment as to whether bail should be granted is undertaken. In the matter of an application for Bail by Isa Islam [2010] ACTSC 147, the ACT Supreme Court considered these provisions and decided that section 9C of the ACT Bail Act was not consistent with the requirement in section 18(5) of the ACT HRA that a person awaiting trial not be detained in custody as a general rule.

Committee comment

1.106 The preceding analysis indicates that there are questions as to the compatibility of the measure with the right to release pending trial.

1.107 The committee seeks the advice of the Attorney-General as to:

  - why the current balancing exercise undertaken by bail authorities and courts is insufficient to address the stated objective of the measure;
  - whether less rights restrictive alternatives are reasonably available (such as adjusting criteria to be applied in determining whether to grant bail rather than a presumption against bail);
  - the existence of adequate and effective safeguards to ensure a person is not deprived of liberty where it is not reasonable, necessary and proportionate in all the circumstances; and
  - advice as to the threshold for rebuttal of the presumption against bail including what is likely to constitute 'exceptional circumstances' to justify bail.

1.108 Mr Leaser deliberately did not participate in consideration of this report entry as he wished to reserve his position pending further consideration of the bill by the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Intelligence and Security, of which he is also a member.

Telecommunications and serious offences

1.109 Schedule 4 of the bill extends the definition of a 'serious offence' in subsection 5D(1)(e) of Part 1.2 of the Telecommunications (Interception and Access) Act 1979 (TIA Act) to include the offences provided for in the bill including sabotage, espionage, foreign interference, other threats to security, theft of trade secrets involving government principals, an aggravated offence for giving false and misleading information as well as secrecy offences under proposed section 122.<sup>68</sup> A 'serious offence' for the purpose of the TIA Act is one in respect of which declared agencies can apply for interception warrants to access the content of communications.<sup>69</sup>

Compatibility of the measure with the right to privacy

1.110 The right to privacy includes the right to respect for private and confidential information, particularly the storing, use and sharing of such information and the right to control the dissemination of information about one's private life. By extending the definition of 'serious offence' and thereby permitting agencies to apply for a warrant to access private communications for investigation of such offences, the measure engages and limits the right to privacy.

68 EM, pp. 298-301.

69 See TIA Act section 46.

1.111 As the TIA Act was legislated prior to the establishment of the committee, the scheme has never been required to be subject to a foundational human rights compatibility assessment in accordance with the terms of the Human Rights (Parliamentary Scrutiny) Act 2011 (Human Rights Act).<sup>70</sup> The committee is therefore faced with the difficult task of assessing the human rights compatibility of extending the potential access to private communications under the TIA Act without the benefit of a foundational human rights assessment of the Act. On a number of previous occasions the committee has recommended that the TIA Act would benefit from a foundational review of its human rights compatibility.<sup>71</sup>

1.112 The statement of compatibility identifies that the measure engages and limits the right to privacy and argues that it constitutes a permissible limitation on this right. Limitations on the right to privacy will be permissible where they are not arbitrary such that they pursue a legitimate objective, are rationally connected to that objective and are a proportionate means of achieving that objective.

1.113 In relation to the objective of the measures, the statement of compatibility provides that:

The gravity of the threat posed to Australia's national security by espionage, foreign interference and related activities demonstrates the need to take reasonable steps to detect, investigate and prosecute those suspected of engaging in such conduct. The current lack of law enforcement and intelligence powers with respect to these activities has resulted in a permissive operating environment for malicious foreign actors, which Australian agencies are unable to effectively disrupt and mitigate.<sup>72</sup>

70 The committee has considered proposed amendments to the TIA Act on a number of previous occasions: See, Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Law Enforcement Integrity Legislation Amendment Bill 2012, Fifth Report of 2012 (October 2012) pp. 21-21; Telecommunications (Interception and Access) Amendment (Data Retention) Bill 2014, Fifteenth Report of the 44th Parliament (14 November 2014) pp. 10-22; Twentieth report of the 44th Parliament (18 March 2015) pp. 39-74; and Thirtieth report of the 44th Parliament (10 November 2015) pp. 133-139; the Counter-Terrorism Legislation Amendment Bill (No. 1) 2015, Thirty-second report of the 44th Parliament (1 December 2015) pp. 3-37 and Thirty-sixth report of the 44th Parliament (16 March 2016) pp. 85-136; the Law Enforcement Legislation Amendment (State Bodies and Other Measures) Bill 2016, Report 9 of 2016 (22 November 2016) pp. 2-8 and Report 1 of 2017 (16 February 2017) pp. 35-44; and the Telecommunications (Interception and Access - Law Enforcement Conduct Commission of New South Wales) Declaration 2017 [F2017L00533], Report 7 of 2017 (8 August 2017) pp. 30-33.

71 See, for example, Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Telecommunications (Interception and Access – Law Enforcement Conduct Commission of New South Wales) Declaration 2017 [F2017L00533], Report 7 of 2017 (8 August 2017) p. 33; Investigation and Prosecution Measures Bill 2017, Report 12 of 2017 (28 November 2017) p. 88.

72 SOC, p. 19.

1.114 This is likely to constitute a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law. Providing law enforcement agencies access to telecommunications content to investigate serious categories of crime is likely to be rationally connected to this objective.

1.115 In relation to the proportionality of the measure, the statement of compatibility points to the threshold requirements for issuing a warrant:

Before issuing an interception warrant, the relevant authority must be satisfied that the agency is investigating a serious offence, the gravity of the offence warrants intrusion into privacy and the interception is likely to support the investigation. This threshold acts as a safeguard against the arbitrary or capricious use of the interception regime and also ensures that any interception will be proportionate to the national security objective.<sup>73</sup>

1.116 This is likely to be a relevant safeguard to assist to ensure that the limitation on the right to privacy is necessary. The statement of compatibility further points to independent oversight mechanisms such as the Commonwealth Ombudsman.

1.117 Notwithstanding these important safeguards, there are still some questions in relation to whether the expansion of the definition of 'serious offence' is permissible in the context of the underlying scheme under the TIA Act. In this respect, it appears that while some of the offences are very serious, others are less so. Further information as to why allowing warranted access for the investigation of each criminal offence is necessary would be useful to determining whether the limitation is proportionate.

1.118 In order to constitute a proportionate limitation on the right to privacy, a limitation must only be as extensive as is strictly necessary. However, it is unclear from the statement of compatibility who or what devices could be subject to warranted access under the TIA Act. It is also unclear what safeguards there are in place with respect to the use, storage and retention of telecommunications content. As such it is unclear whether the expanded definitions of 'serious offences' would be permissible limitations.

Committee comment

1.119 The preceding analysis raises questions as to whether the expanded definition of 'serious crimes' is a proportionate limitation on the right to privacy.

1.120 The committee therefore requests the advice of the Attorney-General as to:

- whether the expanded definition of 'serious offence' in the context of existing provisions of the TIA Act constitutes a proportionate limit on the right to privacy (including why allowing warranted access for the investigation of each criminal offence is necessary; who or what devices could be subject to warranted access; and what safeguards there are with respect to the use, storage and retention of telecommunications content); and

- whether an assessment of the TIA Act could be undertaken to determine its compatibility with the right to privacy.

Amendments to the Foreign Influence Transparency Scheme legislation

1.122 Schedule 5 seeks to amend the definition of 'general political lobbying' in section 10 of the Foreign Influence Transparency Bill 2017 (the foreign influence bill) to include within the definition lobbying of 'a person or entity that is registered under the Commonwealth Electoral Act as a political campaigner'.<sup>74</sup> The effect of the amendments is that a person may be liable to register under the proposed foreign influence transparency scheme where they lobby a registered political campaigner on behalf of a foreign principal 'for the purpose of political or governmental influence'.<sup>75</sup>

1.123 The reference to 'political campaigner' in item 3 incorporates the proposed amendments to the Commonwealth Electoral Act 1918 that are currently before Parliament in the Electoral Legislation Amendment (Electoral Funding and Disclosure Reform) Bill 2017 (the electoral funding bill). As such, section 2 of the bill provides that if either of the foreign influence bill or electoral funding bill does not pass, part 2 of schedule 5 will not commence.

1.124 'Political campaigner' is defined in the electoral funding bill to mean a person or entity that incurs 'political expenditure' during the current, or in any of the previous three, financial years of $100,000 or more.<sup>76</sup> 'Political expenditure' is expenditure incurred for a 'political purpose', the latter of which is defined in the electoral funding bill to include (relevantly) the public expression by any means of views on a political party, a candidate in an election or a member of the House of Representatives or the Senate, and the public expression by any means of views on an issue that is, or is likely to be, before electors in an election (whether or not a writ has been issued for the election).<sup>77</sup>

1.125 Item 4 of the bill also seeks to amend section 12 of the foreign influence bill to expand the circumstances in which an activity is done for 'political or governmental influence'. The amendments provide that a person will undertake activity on behalf of a foreign principal for the purpose of political or governmental influence if the purpose of the activity is to influence, directly or indirectly, any aspect of 'processes in relation to a person or entity registered under the Commonwealth Electoral Act 1918 as a political campaigner'.<sup>78</sup> Item 5 further adds to section 12 examples of 'processes in relation to' a registered political campaigner:

- (a) processes in relation to the campaigner's:
  - (i) constitution; or
  - (ii) platform; or
  - (iii) policy on any matter of public concern; or
  - (iv) administrative or financial affairs (in his or her capacity as a campaigner, if the campaigner is an individual); or
  - (v) membership; or
  - (vi) relationship with foreign principals within the meaning of paragraph (a),(b) or (c) of the definition of foreign principal in section 10,<sup>79</sup> or with bodies controlled by such foreign principals;
- (b) the conduct of the campaigner's campaign in relation to a federal election or designated vote;
- (c) the selection (however done) of officers of the campaigner's executive or delegates to its conferences;
- (d) the selection (however done) of the campaigner's leader and any spokespersons for the campaign.

as to the compatibility of the proposed foreign influence transparency scheme with the freedom of expression,<sup>81</sup> the freedom of association,<sup>82</sup> the right to take part in the conduct of public affairs,<sup>83</sup> and the right to privacy.<sup>84</sup>

1.127 The committee raised concerns in relation to limitations on these rights due to the breadth of the definitions of 'foreign principal', 'on behalf of' and 'for the purpose of political or governmental influence', and whether those definitions caught within the scope of the scheme an uncertain and potentially very broad range of conduct. The committee noted:

For example, concerns have been expressed as to the implications for academic freedom and reputation where an Australian university academic would be required to register upon receipt of a scholarship or grant wholly or partially from foreign sources, where that funding is conditional on the researcher undertaking and publishing research that is intended to influence Australian policy-making. Such behaviour would appear to fall within the types of registrable activities that a person may undertake 'on behalf of' a foreign principal, as it is an activity undertaken 'with funding or supervision by the foreign principal' for the purpose of influencing 'a process in relation to a federal government decision'.<sup>85</sup>

1.128 The committee also noted that the definition of 'foreign principal' coupled with the definition of 'on behalf of' was very broad:

This definition, coupled with the definition of 'on behalf of', appears to be broad enough to mean that section 21 of the bill imposes a registration requirement on domestic civil society, arts or sporting organisations which

81 The right to freedom of expression in Article 19(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) includes freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, either orally, in writing or print, in the form of art, or through any other media of her or his choice.

82 The right to freedom of association in Article 22 of the ICCPR protects the right to join with others in a group to pursue common interests. The right prevents States parties from imposing unreasonable and disproportionate restrictions on the right to form associations, including imposing procedures that may effectively prevent or discourage people from forming an association.

83 The right to take part in public affairs includes the right of every citizen to take part in the conduct of public affairs by exerting influence through public debate and dialogues with representatives either individually or through bodies established to represent citizens.

84 The right to privacy protects against arbitrary and unlawful interferences with an individual's privacy, and recognises that individuals should have an area of autonomous development; a 'private sphere' free from government intervention and excessive unsolicited intervention by others. The right to privacy also includes respect for informational privacy, including the right to control the dissemination of information about one's private life.

85 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Report 1 of 2018 (6 February 2018) pp. 39-40.

may have non-Australian members (such as individuals residing in Australia under a non-permanent resident visa, or foreign members) who may be considered as acting 'on behalf of' a foreign principal where they have undertaken activity 'in collaboration with' or 'in the service of' their membership (including foreign members) when seeking funding from government, engaging in advocacy work, or pursuing policy reform.<sup>86</sup>

1.129 The committee noted that the breadth of these definitions, their potential application, the cost of compliance and the consequence of non-compliance raised concerns that the foreign influence bill may be insufficiently circumscribed.<sup>87</sup>

Previous committee comment on the Electoral Legislation Amendment (Electoral Funding and Disclosure Reform) Bill 2017

1.130 The committee has considered the electoral reform bill in its Report 1 of 2018.<sup>88</sup>

1.131 The committee sought advice from the minister as to the compatibility of the obligation to register as a 'political campaigner' with the freedom of expression, the freedom of association, the right to take part in the conduct of public affairs, and the right to privacy. In particular, the committee noted that concerns arose in relation to the breadth of the definition of 'political expenditure' that triggers the obligation to register as a political campaigner. As noted earlier, the definition of 'political expenditure' broadly refers to expenditure for political purposes. 'Political purpose' is in turn defined broadly, including 'the public expression by any means of views on an issue that is, or is likely to be, before electors in an election', regardless of whether or not a writ has been issued for the election. This would appear to capture activities that arise in an election regardless of how insignificant or incidental the issue is at an election, as no distinction appears to be drawn between whether an issue was one common to all political parties, or an issue that is only raised by one candidate in an election. It is also not clear the basis on which it is, or could be, determined whether an issue is 'likely to be an issue' before electors at an election, and what criteria are in place to make such a determination. The committee noted:

Thus, the ambiguity in the definition of 'political expenditure' ...could lead to considerable uncertainty for persons and entities who may be liable to register. As such, this raises concerns as to whether the proposed registration requirements for individuals and entities are sufficiently circumscribed. The measure could also act as a potential disincentive for some individuals and civil society organisations to run important campaigns, or could act as a disincentive for individuals to form organisations to run such campaigns. In other words, the registration requirement may have a particular 'chilling effect' on the freedom of expression, freedom of association and right to take part in public affairs for some groups and individuals.<sup>89</sup>

1.132 The committee also noted that an additional issue that arose was that as a consequence of registration, personal information about individuals may be publicly available. The committee noted:

In circumstances where the definition of 'political expenditure' is very broad and may capture a wide range of individuals and groups, this raises additional concerns that the bill goes further than what is strictly necessary to serve the legitimate objective, and may insufficiently protect against attacks on reputation that may result from individuals and entities being required to register.<sup>90</sup>

Compatibility of the amendments

1.133 The statement of compatibility to the bill does not specifically address the amendments that are introduced by schedule 5 of the bill. However, as these amendments broaden the scope of the foreign influence transparency scheme by including lobbying of 'political campaigners' on behalf of foreign principals, the existing human rights concerns with the operation of the foreign influence bill and the electoral funding bill are equally applicable here.

1.134 In particular, as noted in the initial analysis of the electoral funding bill, because the definition of 'political campaigner' may capture a broad variety of persons or entities who undertake expenditure for a 'political purpose', this may give rise to considerable uncertainty as to which persons and entities are required to register, and also raises potential concerns that rather than providing greater transparency the measure may create confusion in certain circumstances about degrees of political connection.<sup>91</sup> By introducing an obligation to register under the foreign influence transparency scheme for persons who lobby political campaigners on behalf of foreign principals, the uncertainty that is introduced with the concept of 'political campaigner' is incorporated into the foreign influence bill.

1.135 There are also related concerns about the expanded definition of 'political or governmental influence' to include processes relating to the internal functioning of the political campaigner, such as its constitution, administration and membership. It is not clear how introducing a registration obligation on persons or entities who lobby political campaigners in such circumstances is rationally connected to the stated objective of the foreign influence bill (namely, 'to enhance government and public knowledge of the level and extent to which foreign sources may, through intermediaries acting on their behalf, influence the conduct of Australia's elections, government and parliamentary decision-making, and the creation and implementation of laws and policies<sup>92</sup>). Further, concerns also arise as to whether the expanded definition of 'political or governmental influence' is proportionate, having regard to the principle that limitations must be sufficiently circumscribed to ensure that they are only as is strictly necessary to achieve their objective.

Committee comment

1.136 The statement of compatibility does not address the human rights compatibility of schedule 5 of the bill, which amends the Foreign Influence Transparency Scheme Bill 2017 by incorporating the concept of 'political campaigner' from the Electoral Legislation Amendment (Electoral Funding and Disclosure Reform) Bill 2017. However, as noted in its Report 1 of 2018, the proposed foreign influence transparency scheme and the electoral funding reform bill engage and limit the freedom of expression, the freedom of association, the right to take part in the conduct of public affairs, and the right to privacy.

1.137 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the Attorney-General as to whether the amendments to the Foreign Influence Transparency Scheme Bill 2017 introduced by schedule 5 pursue a legitimate objective, are rationally connected and proportionate to that objective. In particular:

- whether introducing a requirement for persons to register under the foreign influence transparency scheme when they lobby a 'political campaigner' on behalf of a foreign principal is sufficiently circumscribed, having regard to the definition of 'political campaigner' in the Electoral Legislation Amendment (Electoral Funding and Disclosure Reform) Bill 2017; and
- whether expanding the definition of 'political or governmental influence' to include the matters raised in item 5 of schedule 5 is rationally connected to the objective of the foreign influence transparency scheme, and whether it is sufficiently circumscribed so as to constitute a proportionate limitation on human rights.

Background

1.140 The Social Security (Administration) Act 1999 provides the legislative basis for the income management regime for certain welfare recipients in the Northern Territory and other prescribed locations.<sup>1</sup> Income management limits the amount of income support paid to recipients as unconditional cash transfers and imposes restrictions on how the remaining 'quarantined' funds can be spent. A person's income support can be subject to automatic deductions to meet 'priority needs', such as food, housing and healthcare. The remainder of the restricted funds can only be accessed using a 'BasicsCard', which can only be used in certain stores and cannot be used to purchase 'excluded goods' or 'excluded services'.<sup>2</sup>

1.141 A person on welfare benefits can voluntarily sign up for income management, or be made subject to compulsory income management.

1 See Social Security (Administration) Act 1999, Part 3B.

2 See, further, Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, 2016 Review of Stronger Futures measures (16 March 2016) p. 39.

1.142 The committee examined the income management regime in its 2013 and 2016 Reviews of the Stronger Futures measures.<sup>3</sup> In its 2016 review, the committee noted that the income management measures engage and limit the right to equality and non-discrimination, the right to social security and the right to privacy and family.<sup>4</sup>

Determining the Northern Territory Department of Health as a recognised State/Territory authority for the purposes of Part 3B of the *Social Security (Administration) Act 1999

1.143 The Social Security (Administration) (Recognised State/Territory Authority – Northern Territory Department of Health) Determination 2017 (the determination) determines the Northern Territory Department of Health as a recognised State/Territory authority for the purposes of Part 3B of the Social Security (Administration) Act. The effect of being recognised as a State/Territory authority is that an officer or employee of the Northern Territory Department of Health may give the Secretary of the relevant Commonwealth department a written notice requiring that a person be subject to income management.<sup>5</sup>

1.144 The determination replaces the Social Security (Administration) (Recognised State/Territory Authority – NT Alcohol Mandatory Treatment Tribunal) Determination 2013 which recognised the NT Alcohol Mandatory Treatment Tribunal (AMTT) as a State/Territory authority for the purposes of Part 3B. The AMTT previously had responsibility for issuing notices that people be subject to income management in accordance with the Alcohol Mandatory Treatment Act 2013 (NT) (AMT Act).

1.145 However, the AMT Act and AMTT framework were repealed and replaced by the Alcohol Harm Reduction Act 2017 (NT) (Alcohol Harm Reduction Act). The Alcohol Harm Reduction Act establishes a legal framework for making banned drinker orders (BDOs) to enable adults to be registered on the banned drinkers register (BDR). BDOs and the BDR are facilitated by the BDR Registrar, who is located within the Northern Territory Department of Health and is an employee of that department.

1.146 The Alcohol Harm Reduction Act provides that the BDR Registrar may order than an adult is required to be subject to income management if the BDR Registrar is satisfied that:

- (c) the adult, or the adult's partner, is an eligible recipient of a category H welfare payment under Part 3B of the Social Security Administration Act.<sup>6</sup>

Compatibility of the measure with multiple rights

1.147 The 2016 Review considered that income management, including the income management referral scheme undertaken by the former AMTT,<sup>7</sup> engages and limits the following rights:

- the right to equality and non-discrimination;
- the right to social security; and
- the right to privacy and family.

1.148 Each of these rights is discussed in detail in the context of the income management regime in the committee's 2016 Review of Stronger Futures measures (2016 Review).<sup>8</sup>

1.149 The statement of compatibility for the determination recognises that multiple rights are engaged and limited by the determination. In relation to the right to social security, the statement of compatibility explains that income management does not reduce a person's social security payment, it just changes the way the person receives it.<sup>9</sup> The statement of compatibility further states that to the extent income management may disproportionately affect Indigenous Australians, any such limitation is reasonable and proportionate.<sup>10</sup> Further, it states that the limitation on how a person accesses and spends their money is a proportionate limitation on a person's right to a private life in order to achieve the objectives of ensuring income support payments are used to meet the essential needs of vulnerable people and their dependents.<sup>11</sup> It concludes:

The recognition of the Northern Territory Department of Health as an income management referring authority will advance the protection of human rights by ensuring that income support payments are spent in the best interests of welfare payment recipients and their dependents. To the extent the determination may limit human rights, those limitations are reasonable, necessary and proportionate to achieving the legitimate objective of income management.<sup>12</sup>

1.150 In the 2016 Review, the committee accepted that the income management regime pursues a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law, but questioned whether the measures were rationally connected to achieving the stated objective and were proportionate.<sup>13</sup> The committee's report noted:

While the income management regime may be of some benefit to those who voluntarily enter the program, it has limited effectiveness for the vast majority of people who are compelled to be part of it.<sup>14</sup>

1.151 The previous regime for referral to income management under the AMT Act required the AMTT to make an income management order if a person is subject to a mandatory treatment order.<sup>15</sup> In its 2016 review, the committee noted that the availability of any individual assessment of whether income management was appropriate for persons who received payments was relevant in assessing the proportionality of the measure:

In assessing whether a measure is proportionate some of the relevant factors to consider include whether the measure provides sufficient flexibility to treat different cases differently or whether it imposes a blanket policy without regard to the merits of an individual case, whether affected groups are particularly vulnerable, and whether there are other less restrictive ways to achieve the same aim...<sup>16</sup>

1.152 The BDR Registrar's powers in the Alcohol Harm Reduction Act provide greater flexibility to consider individual circumstances when determining whether

15 Section 34 of the Alcohol Mandatory Treatment Act 2013. A mandatory treatment order was able to be made when the AMTT considered that an adult is misusing alcohol, had lost the capacity to make appropriate decisions about their alcohol use or personal welfare and the misuse was a risk to their health, safety or welfare or to others: see Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, 2016 Review of Stronger Futures measures (16 March 2016) p. 41.

income management should be ordered, including considering whether 'the adult would benefit from the making of an income management order'. An adult who is subject to income management may also apply to the BDR Registrar for variation or revocation of an income management order, and upon such application the BDR Registrar may vary or revoke the order if satisfied that it is appropriate to do so having regard to the criteria for making the order.<sup>17</sup> The new determination, and the income management referral scheme under the Alcohol Harm Reduction Act enabled by the determination, is therefore an improvement to the continuing compulsory income management as it allows flexibility to treat different cases differently and provides for consideration of a person's individual suitability for the program.

1.153 However, notwithstanding the greater flexibility to consider individual circumstances, the income management orders made by the BDR Registrar still impose compulsory, rather than voluntary, income management. The committee previously raised concerns in its 2016 review that imposing income management compulsorily may not be the least rights restrictive means of achieving the legitimate objectives of the measure.<sup>18</sup> Therefore, insofar as the regime does not operate voluntarily, the concerns raised in the 2016 Review regarding compulsory income management remain.

Bills not raising human rights concerns

1.156 Of the bills introduced into the Parliament between 5 and 8 February, the following did not raise human rights concerns (this may be because the bill does not engage or promotes human rights, and/or permissibly limits human rights):

- Commonwealth Inscribed Stock Amendment (Debt Ceiling) Bill 2018;
- Fair Work Amendment (Improving National Employment Standards) Bill 2018;
- Foreign Acquisitions and Takeovers Fees Imposition Amendment (Near-new Dwelling Interests) Bill 2018;
- Road Vehicle Standards Charges (Imposition—Customs) Bill 2018;
- Road Vehicle Standards Charges (Imposition—Excise) Bill 2018;
- Road Vehicle Standards Charges (Imposition—General) Bill 2018;
- Road Vehicle Standards (Consequential and Transitional Provisions) Bill 2018;
- Treasury Laws Amendment (2018 Measures No. 1) Bill 2018; and
- Treasury Laws Amendment (2018 Measures No. 2) Bill 2018.

Background

2.3 The committee first reported on the ASIC Credit (Flexible Credit Cost Arrangements) Instrument 2017/780 [F2017L01141] (the instrument) in its Report 12 of 2017, and requested a response from the Treasurer by 13 December 2017.<sup>1</sup>

2.4 The Assistant Minister to the Treasurer's response to the committee's inquiries was received on 29 January 2018. The response is discussed below and is reproduced in full at Appendix 3.

1 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Report 12 of 2017 (28 November 2017) pp. 2-5.

Civil penalty provisions

2.5 The instrument seeks to amend the National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 to introduce certain prohibitions under proposed new sections 53A and 53B applying to holders of an Australian credit licence (ACL) and some exempt special purpose funding entities<sup>2</sup> (collectively referred to as 'regulated persons').

2.6 Under proposed section 53A, regulated persons are prohibited from paying 'flex commissions' to intermediaries, such as car dealers, or associated persons. 'Flex commissions' refers to an arrangement in which an intermediary who sells a loan to a consumer earns a larger commission from his or her credit provider the higher the annual interest rate is above a base rate.<sup>3</sup> A breach of the prohibition applies to regulated persons and carries a civil penalty of up to 2,000 penalty units ($420,000) or a criminal penalty of up to 100 penalty units ($21,000) or 2 years imprisonment, or both.

2.7 Proposed section 53B also prohibits regulated persons who are party to a flexible credit cost arrangement from giving benefits to intermediaries or associated persons in circumstances where these persons are to be paid a fee or charges that exceed the amount specified by a regulated person. If a regulated person does not specify a fee, that fee is taken to be $0 (in other words, the intermediary or associated person cannot charge a fee).

2.8 In addition, the instrument introduces related procedural requirements providing that the regulated person must not determine the amount of specified fees or charges by reference to the loss or potential loss of revenue as a result of the proposed prohibition on flex commissions<sup>4</sup> and must keep records relating to the basis for determining the specified fees or charges for a period of seven years.<sup>5</sup> A breach of this prohibition and associated requirements also carries a civil penalty of up to 2,000 penalty units ($420,000), a criminal penalty of up to 100 penalty units ($21,000) or 2 years imprisonment, or both.

Compatibility of the measure with criminal process rights

2.9 Civil penalty provisions are dealt with in accordance with the rules and procedures that apply in relation to civil matters, where the burden of proof is on the

2 Special purpose funding entities are described in the explanatory statement as 'a vehicle established to raise or receive funds from investors or a securitisation entity that usually has no employees and acts through a servicing agreement with a third party who must hold an ACL and who is required to meet the obligations of a credit provider under the agreement. A special purpose funding entity therefore does not need to hold an ACL if it operates under the exemption in the National Credit Regulations'. See ES, p. 6.

3 Explanatory Statement (ES) 1.

4 See subsection 53B(3).

5 See subsection 53B(4).

balance of probabilities. However, if a civil penalty provision is in substance regarded as 'criminal' for the purposes of international human rights law it therefore engages criminal process rights under articles 14 and 15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). The classification of a penalty as 'criminal' under international human rights law does not mean that the penalty is illegitimate, but rather that criminal process rights, such as the right to be presumed innocent and the right not to be tried and punished twice, apply.

2.10 As stated in the initial analysis, the statement of compatibility does not identify that any rights are engaged or limited by the measure and does not address whether the civil penalty provisions may be classified as 'criminal' for the purposes of international human rights law.

2.11 The committee's Guidance Note 2 sets out some of the key human rights compatibility issues in relation to civil penalties. Applying Guidance Note 2, the first step in determining whether a penalty is 'criminal' is to look to its classification under domestic law. Under the instrument, the pecuniary penalty of 2,000 penalty units is classified as 'civil'. However, this is not determinative of its status under international human rights law as a penalty or sanction may be 'criminal' for the purposes of the ICCPR even where it is classified as 'civil' under Australian law.

2.12 The second step is to consider the nature and purpose of the penalty. The penalty is likely to be considered to be criminal if the purpose of the penalty is to punish or deter, and the penalty applies to the public in general (rather than being restricted to people in a specific regulatory or disciplinary context). The initial analysis stated that, while the explanatory statement sets out the primary purpose of the instrument (addressing consumer harm arising from distortions in pricing that disproportionately affect vulnerable consumers),<sup>6</sup> no reasoning is provided in the explanatory materials as to the purpose of imposing civil penalties and the rationale for the amounts of those penalties. However, it was noted that the penalty applies to a particular regulatory context, namely to credit providers who are party to a flexible credit cost arrangement.

2.13 The third step is to consider the severity of the penalty. A penalty is likely to be considered 'criminal' where it carries a substantial pecuniary sanction. However, this must be assessed with due regard to regulatory context, including the nature of the industry or sector being regulated and the relative size of the pecuniary penalties being imposed. In this case, an individual or entity could be exposed to a penalty of up to $420,000. The initial analysis assessed that a significant sanction such as this raises the concern that the penalty may be 'criminal' for the purposes of international human rights law.

2.14 As set out above, if the civil penalty provisions in the instrument were considered to be 'criminal' for the purposes of international human rights law, they must be shown to be compatible with the criminal process guarantees set out in articles 14 and 15 of the ICCPR. For example, the application of a civil rather than a criminal standard of proof would raise concerns in relation to the right to be presumed innocent, which generally requires that the prosecution prove each element of the offence to the criminal standard of proof of beyond reasonable doubt. Accordingly, were the civil penalty provisions to be considered 'criminal' for the purpose of international human rights law, there would be questions about whether they are compatible with criminal process rights.

2.15 The committee therefore drew the attention of the Treasurer to its Guidance Note 2 and sought the advice of the Treasurer as to whether:

- the civil penalty provisions in the instrument may be considered to be 'criminal' in nature for the purposes of international human rights law (having regard to the committee's Guidance Note 2); and
- if the penalties could be considered 'criminal' for the purposes of international human rights law, how, and whether, the measures could be amended to accord with criminal process rights (including specific guarantees of the right to a fair trial in the determination of a criminal charge such as the presumption of innocence (article 14(2)), the right not to incriminate oneself (article 14(3)(g)), the right not to be tried and punished twice for an offence (article 14(7)) and a guarantee against retrospective criminal laws (article 15(1))).

Assistant minister's response

2.16 In his response, the assistant minister provides the following information on the civil penalty provisions in the instrument:

...The Explanatory Statement to the instrument explains that the use of flex commissions contributes to consumer harm due to distortions in the pricing of car finance. In particular, ASIC has identified that consumer harm from flex commissions disproportionately affects vulnerable customers. Due to the detrimental effect that these commissions have on vulnerable consumers, it is important that penalties in this area have a genuine deterrent effect. The Government considers that the maximum civil penalty of $420,000 is appropriate given the potential consumer detriment that may result from contravention.

In relation to the Committee's concerns, and taking into account the Committee's Guidance Note 2 on offence provisions, civil penalties and human rights, the following factors support the view that the civil penalties included in the flex commissions instrument are not criminal in nature:

- the $420,000 penalty is not a criminal penalty under Australian law;

- the maximum penalty applies exclusively to Australian credit licensees and exempt special purpose funding entities, and not to the general public; and
- the proportionate size of the maximum penalty, given the corporate nature of the financial services industry. Further, the maximum penalty is consistent with penalties imposed by other provisions in Chapter 2 of the National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (the credit act), for example, sections 69 and 70 of the Credit Act.

2.17 The assistant minister's response acknowledges that the purpose of the penalty is to deter. However, the response explains that the penalty only applies to certain credit providers, not the public in general. Further, although the pecuniary sanction is substantial, as noted in the assistant minister's response, the penalty operates in the particular regulatory context of the financial services industry. Therefore, given the penalty will not apply to the general public and that it operates in the corporate context of the financial services industry, it is likely that the penalty would not be considered 'criminal' for the purposes of international human rights law.

Committee response

2.18 The committee thanks the assistant minister for his response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.19 In light of the further information provided, the committee considers that the civil penalty provisions in the instrument are unlikely to be considered 'criminal' for the purposes of international human rights law.

Background

2.20 The committee first reported on the Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work 2016 [F2016L01859] and the Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work Amendment Instrument 2017 [F2017L00132] (the instruments) in its Report 5 of 2017 and requested a response from the Minister for Employment by 30 June 2017.<sup>1</sup> The minister's response to the committee's inquiries was received on 3 July 2017 and discussed in Report 9 of 2017.<sup>2</sup>

2.21 The committee requested a further response from the minister by 20 September 2017. The response was received on 5 October 2017 and discussed in Report 12 of 2017.<sup>3</sup>

1 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Report 5 of 2017 (14 June 2017) pp. 2-13.

2 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Report 9 of 2017 (5 September 2017) pp. 45-63.

3 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Report 12 of 2017 (28 November 2017) pp. 58-79.

2.22 The committee requested a third response from the minister by 13 December 2017. The minister's response to the committee's inquiries was received on 31 January 2018. The response is discussed below and is reproduced in full at Appendix 3.

Code for tendering and performance of building work

2.23 The committee previously examined the Building and Construction (Improving Productivity) Act 2016 (ABCC Act) which is the authorising legislation for the instruments in its Second Report of the 44th Parliament, Tenth Report of the 44th Parliament, Fourteenth Report of the 44th Parliament and Thirty-fourth Report of the 44th Parliament and Report 7 of 2016.<sup>4</sup>

2.24 Under section 34 of the ABCC Act, the Minister for Employment is empowered to issue a code of practice that is required to be followed by persons in respect of building work. The instrument sets up a code of practice for all building industry participants that seek to be, or are, involved in Commonwealth funded building work (a code covered entity). As noted in the previous human rights analysis, the code of practice contains a number of requirements which engage and limit human rights and are discussed further below.

Content of agreements and prohibited conduct

2.25 Section 11(1) of the code of conduct provides that a code covered entity must not be covered by an enterprise agreement in respect of building work which includes clauses that:

- impose or purport to impose limits on the right of the code covered entity to manage its business or to improve productivity;
- discriminate, or have the effect of discriminating, against certain persons, classes of employees, or subcontractors; or 4 The committee originally considered the Building and Construction Industry (Improving Productivity) Bill 2013 and Building and Construction Industry (Consequential and Transitional Provisions) Bill 2013 in Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Second Report of the 44th Parliament (11 February 2014) pp. 1-30; Tenth Report of the 44th Parliament (26 August 2014) pp. 43-77; and Fourteenth Report of the 44th Parliament (28 October 2014) pp. 106-113. These bills were then reintroduced as the Building and Construction Industry (Improving Productivity) Bill 2013 [No. 2] and the Building and Construction Industry (Consequential and Transitional Provisions) Bill 2013 [No. 2]; see Thirty-fourth Report of the 44th Parliament (23 February 2016) 2. The bills were reintroduced to the Senate on 31 August 2016, following the commencement of the 45th Parliament; see Report 7 of 2016 (11 October 2016) pp. 62-63. See also, International Labour Organization, Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, Direct Request, adopted 2016, published 106th ILC session (2017) Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) – Australia.

- are inconsistent with freedom of association requirements set out in section 13 of the code of practice.

2.26 Section 11(3) further provides that clauses are not permitted to be included in the enterprise agreement in relation to a range of matters including the number of employees, consultation on particular matters, the engagement of particular classes of staff, contractors and subcontractors, casualisation and the type of contracts to be offered, redundancy, demobilisation and redeployment, loaded pay, allocation of work to particular employees, external monitoring of the agreement, encouraging, discouraging or supporting people being union members, when and where work can be performed, union access to the workplace beyond what is provided for in legislation, and granting of facilities to be used by union members, officers or delegates.

2.27 Section 11A additionally provides that code covered entities must not be covered by enterprise agreements that purport to remedy or render ineffective other clauses that are inconsistent with section 11.

2.28 The effect of a failure to meet the requirements of section 11 by a code covered entity is to render the entity ineligible to tender for, or be awarded, Commonwealth funded work.

Initial human rights analysis – compatibility of the measure with the right to collectively bargain and the right to just and favourable conditions of work

2.29 The right to freedom of association includes the right to collectively bargain without unreasonable and disproportionate interference from the state. The right to just and favourable conditions of work includes the right to safe working conditions. These rights are protected by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR).<sup>5</sup>

2.30 As stated in the initial analysis, the interpretation of these rights is informed by International Labour Organization (ILO) treaties, including the ILO Convention of 1948 concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize (ILO Convention No. 87) and the ILO Convention of 1949 concerning the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining (ILO Convention No. 98), which protects the right of employees to collectively bargain for terms and conditions of employment.<sup>6</sup> The principle of 'autonomy of bargaining' in the negotiation of collective agreements is an 'essential element' of Article 4 of ILO Convention No. 98 which envisages that

5 See, article 22 of the ICCPR and article 8 of the ICESCR.

6 The Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize (ILO Convention No. 87) is expressly referred to in the ICCPR and the ICESCR.

parties will be free to reach their own settlement of a collective agreement without interference.<sup>7</sup>

2.31 The initial analysis stated that excluding certain code covered entity employers from being awarded Commonwealth funded work if they are subject to an enterprise agreement containing specific terms is likely to act as a disincentive for the inclusion of such terms in enterprise agreements. The measure is likely to have a corresponding restrictive effect on the scope of negotiations on a broad range of matters including those that relate to terms and conditions of employment and how work is performed. As such, the initial analysis stated that the measure interferes with the outcome of the bargaining process and the inclusion of particular terms in enterprise agreements. Accordingly, the measure engages and limits the right to just and favourable conditions of work and the right to collectively bargain.

2.32 Measures limiting the right to freedom of association including the right to collectively bargain may be permissible providing certain criteria are satisfied. Generally, to be capable of justifying a limit on human rights, the measure must address a legitimate objective, be rationally connected to that objective and be a proportionate way to achieve that objective.<sup>8</sup> Further, Article 22(3) of the ICCPR and article 8 of the ICESCR expressly provide that no limitations are permissible on this right if they are inconsistent with the guarantees of freedom of association and the right to collectively organise contained in the ILO Convention No. 87.

2.33 In the initial analysis, it was noted that the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA Committee), which is a supervisory mechanism that examines complaints about violations of the right to freedom of association and the right to collectively bargain, has stated that 'measures taken unilaterally by the authorities to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are often incompatible with Convention

No. 98'.<sup>9</sup> The CFA Committee has noted that there are some circumstances in which it might be legitimate for a government to limit the outcomes of a bargaining process, stating that 'any limitation on collective bargaining on the part of the authorities should be preceded by consultations with the workers' and employers' organizations in an effort to obtain their agreement'.<sup>10</sup>

2.34 In relation to the limitation that section 11 imposes on the right to collectively bargain, the statement of compatibility argues:

...the limitation is reasonable, necessary and proportionate in pursuit of the legitimate objective of seeking to ensure that enterprise agreements are not used to limit the ability of code covered entities to manage their businesses efficiently or restrict productivity improvements in the building and construction industry more generally.<sup>11</sup>

2.35 The initial human rights analysis stated that limited information is provided in the statement of compatibility as to whether the stated objective addresses a pressing and substantial concern such that it may be considered a legitimate objective for the purpose of international human rights law or whether the measure is rationally connected to (that is, effective to achieve) that stated objective.

2.36 Further, no information was provided about the proportionality of the measure. In this respect, it was noted that section 11 imposes practical restrictions on the inclusion of a very broad range of matters relating to terms and conditions of employment in enterprise agreements. It was also noted that section 11(1)(a) is particularly broad and provides a practical restriction on the inclusion of a clause in an enterprise agreement which imposes or purports to impose limits on the right of the code covered entity to manage its business or to improve productivity. This clause raises concerns for it may be understood to cover many matters that are usually the subject of enterprise agreements such as ordinary working hours, overtime, rates of pay and any types of work performed.

2.37 Additionally, the initial analysis noted that the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (CEACR), another international supervisory mechanism, had recently reported on Australia's compliance with the right to collectively bargain in respect of matters which would also be covered by section 11. In relation to restrictions on the scope of collective bargaining and bargaining outcomes, the committee noted that 'parties should not be penalized for deciding to include these issues in their negotiations' and requested that Australia review such matters 'with a view to removing these restrictions on collective bargaining matters'.<sup>12</sup>

2.38 The CFA Committee has also raised concerns in relation to similar measures previously enacted by Australia under the Building and Construction Industry Improvement Act 2005 and stated that:

The [CFA] Committee recalls that the right to bargain freely with employers with respect to conditions of work constitutes an essential element in freedom of association, and trade unions should have the right, through collective bargaining or other lawful means, to seek to improve the living and working conditions of those whom the trade unions represent. The public authorities should refrain from any interference, which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof. Any such interference would appear to infringe the principle that workers' and employers' organizations should have the right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes... The [CFA] Committee considers that the matters which might be subject to collective bargaining include the type of agreement to be offered to employees or the type of industrial instrument to be negotiated in the future, as well as wages, benefits and allowances, working time, annual leave, selection criteria in case of redundancy, the coverage of the collective agreement, the granting of trade union facilities, including access to the workplace beyond what is provided for in legislation etc.; these matters should not be excluded from the scope of collective bargaining by law, or as in this case, by financial disincentives and considerable penalties applicable in case of non-implementation of the Code and Guidelines.<sup>13</sup>

2.39 As the initial analysis noted, concerns about restrictions Australia has imposed on the right to freedom of association and the right to collectively bargain have also been raised by the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (UNCESCR) in its Concluding Observations on Australia.<sup>14</sup> Such comments from supervisory mechanisms were not addressed in the statement of compatibility. The committee has also previously commented on other measures which engage and limit these rights and raised concerns.<sup>15</sup>

2.40 Accordingly, the committee sought the advice of the Minister for Employment as to:

- whether there is reasoning or evidence that establishes that the stated objective addresses a pressing or substantial concern or whether the proposed changes are otherwise aimed at achieving a legitimate objective;
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) that objective;
- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve that objective (including findings by relevant international supervisory mechanisms about whether the limitation is permissible);
- whether consultation has occurred with the relevant workers' and employers' organisations in relation to the measure; and
- the government's response to the previous comments and recommendations made by international supervisory mechanisms including whether the government agrees with these views.

Minister's initial response – the content of agreements and prohibited conduct

2.41 The minister's initial response, discussed in Report 9 of 2017,<sup>16</sup> provided a range of detailed information about the importance of the construction industry citing its size and its role in 'driving economic growth'. The minister's response identified the objectives of the measure as improving 'efficiency, productiveness and jobs growth' in the construction industry and 'to ensure that enterprise agreements are not used to limit the ability of code covered entities to manage their businesses efficiently or restrict productivity improvement'. It also identified the further objectives of ensuring that 'subcontractors have the ability to genuinely bargain and not be subject to coercion through the imposition of particular types of agreements by head contractors and unions; and to ensure that freedom of association is not impinged upon'.

2.42 Information and reasoning was provided in relation to the importance of some, but not all, of these objectives. While the minister's initial response was not put in these terms, to the extent that the measure is aimed at addressing the rights and freedoms of others, this was noted in the previous analysis of the minister's initial response as capable of constituting a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law.

2.43 The minister's response outlined specific concerns in relation to what she terms 'restrictive clauses' in enterprise agreements and their impact on productivity. With reference to some industry reports, the minister argued that these clauses 'are often forced onto subcontractors by head contractors that have made agreements with unions, are contributing to costs and delays of projects within the building and construction industry'. The minister's response stated that:

Head contractors on building sites typically employ few workers yet they often enter into deals with unions that mandate the pay and conditions for all other workers on the site, preventing those workers from engaging in genuine collective bargaining with their respective employer. The 2016 Code therefore prohibits clauses that prescribe the terms and conditions on which subcontractors and their employees are engaged.

2.44 The minister's response also provided a number of examples of the kind of clauses in enterprise agreements which she considers are of concern in the building and construction industry.<sup>17</sup> In essence, the minister appeared to argue that these clauses restrict the freedoms of certain employers and subcontractors and should accordingly be prohibited on the basis of their impact on building industry costs. In broad terms, in this respect, the measure may be rationally connected to the rights and freedoms of others.

2.45 The minister further pointed to unlawful behaviour by members and representatives of the Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (CFMEU) as being of concern. Some of the behaviour referred to relates to taking industrial action. However, it was noted that current restrictions on industrial action under Australian domestic law have been criticised by international supervisory mechanisms as going beyond what is permissible under international law.<sup>18</sup> Further, it was unclear how such suspected contraventions relate to the proposed measure or are rationally connected to the stated objective of this measure.

17 These include clauses that provide subcontractors need to afford workers equivalent terms and conditions to those contained in the relevant enterprise agreement; that contain limitations on when and the ways in which employers can direct employees to perform work; paid union meetings on work time; and clauses requiring union consultation.

2.46 The minister's response argued that, in some respects, the code promotes collective bargaining as it requires terms and conditions of employment to be dealt with in enterprise agreements made under the Fair Work Act 2009. However, merely restating in the code (which is a form of subordinate legislation) the current legal framework that applies in primary legislation is unlikely to constitute the promotion of this right.

2.47 In relation to the proportionality of the limitation, the minister's response explained the scope of the code and what would and would not be restricted in terms of bargaining outcomes:

The 2016 Code does not prohibit such matters as rostered days off or shift allowances, public holidays, or stable and agreed shift arrangements and rosters. Nor does it prohibit or restrict the right of workers and their representatives (including a union) to be consulted on redundancies and labour hire.

The 2016 Code does prevent clauses in agreements that limit the ability of workers and their employers to determine their day-to-day work arrangements. For example, clauses in enterprise agreements that require the additional agreement of the union, such as where an employee wishes to substitute a different rostered day off and the employer agrees, would not be permitted.

It is worth noting that the types of clauses described in sections 11 and 11A are not strictly prohibited from being included in enterprise

The Committee recommends that the State party bring its legislation on trade union rights into line with article 8 of the Covenant and with the provisions of the relevant International Labour Organization (ILO) Conventions (nos. 87 and 98), particularly by removing penalties, including six months of incarceration, for industrial action, or the secret ballot requirements for workers who wish to take industrial action.' agreements; being an "opt-in system", building contractors that do not wish to undertake Commonwealth-funded building work do not need to comply with the requirements of the Code.

2.48 Accordingly, the minister's response clarified that there are a number of clauses in enterprise agreements relating to terms and conditions of employment which will not be prohibited. However, the response did not fully address the breadth of restrictions that are imposed by the measure on the content of enterprise agreements and why those restrictions are justified limitations on the right to collectively bargain. Further, while it is true that compliance with the code is not mandatory for building contractors, as noted in the initial analysis, the significant commercial consequences of not complying with the code impose a disincentive for the inclusion of particular clauses in enterprise agreements.<sup>19</sup> In practice, this may have a far reaching effect in terms of enterprise agreements in the building industry, particularly given that once an entity becomes a code covered entity, it must comply with the code on all new projects, including those which are not Commonwealth funded.<sup>20</sup> On the information provided by the minister, it did not appear that the limitation on the right to collectively bargain was likely to be proportionate.

2.49 As noted in the initial analysis, international supervisory mechanisms have been critical of these restrictions on bargaining outcomes.<sup>21</sup> For example, in relation to a draft of the code, the ILO Committee of Experts (CEACR) has reported that 'parties should not be penalized for deciding to include these issues in their negotiations' and requested that Australia review such matters 'with a view to removing these restrictions on collective bargaining matters'.<sup>22</sup>

2.50 UNCESCR has a specific role to monitor the compliance of state parties with the ICESCR. Since the committee initially reported on the measure in its Report 5 of 2017, UNCESCR has published its 2017 concluding observations on Australia which expressed specific concerns about the code:

The [UNCESCR] is concerned about the existence of legal restrictions to the exercise of trade union rights, including in the Fair Work Amendment Act of 2015, the Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work 2016, and The Building and Construction Industry (Improving Productivity) Act 2016.<sup>23</sup>

2.51 In response to the committee's question about whether consultation had occurred with the relevant workers' and employers' organisations regarding the measures, the minister's response outlined a number of examples of consultation which occurred with employer organisations and unions. Consultation processes are relevant to an assessment of the measure, and may assist in determining whether a limitation is the least rights restrictive means of pursuing a legitimate objective on the available evidence. However, the previous analysis of the minister's initial response stated that, the fact of consultation alone was not sufficient to address the human rights concerns in relation to the measure.

2.52 In relation to the committee's request that the minister address the concerns raised by international supervisory mechanisms, the minister's initial response did not provide further information other than to note that much of the previous UNCESCR comments were focused around restrictions on industrial action.

2.53 The preceding analysis stated that the measure was likely to be incompatible with the right to collectively bargain, noting in particular recent concerns raised by the UNCESCR and the ILO Committee of Experts in relation to the code. However, the committee invited the minister to provide further information for the committee's consideration.

Minister's second response – the content of agreements and prohibited conduct

2.54 The minister's further response, discussed in Report 12 of 2017,<sup>24</sup> did not provide additional information but restated the government's view that 'these provisions are of a reasonable and proportionate nature' and 'appropriate to our national conditions'.

2.55 The committee considered that, in the absence of additional information addressing these concerns, the measure was likely to be incompatible with the right to collectively bargain.

24 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Report 12 of 2017 (28 November 2017) pp. 58- 79.

2.56 The committee therefore sought further advice from the minister in relation to the compatibility of the measure with the right to collectively bargain, in particular any information in light of the recent concerns raised by the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in relation to the code.

Minister's third response – the content of agreements and prohibited conduct

2.57 On this aspect of the measures, the minister's third response to the committee refers to her previous response to the committee and does not provide additional information in light of recent concerns raised by international supervisory bodies in relation to the code.

Committee response

2.58 The committee thanks the minister for her response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.59 The preceding analysis indicates that the measure is likely to be incompatible with the right to collectively bargain, noting in particular recent concerns raised by the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in relation to the code.

Prohibiting the display of particular signs and union logos, mottos or indicia

2.60 Section 13(2)(b)-(c) provides that the code covered entity must ensure that 'no ticket, no start' signs, or similar, are not displayed as well as signs that seek to 'vilify or harass employees who participate, or do not participate, in industrial activities are not displayed'.

2.61 Section 13(2)(j) provides that union logos, mottos or indicia are not applied to clothing, property or equipment supplied by, or which provision is made by, the employer or any other conduct which implies that membership of a building association is anything other than an individual choice for each employee.

Initial human rights analysis – compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of expression

2.62 The right to freedom of opinion and expression is protected by article 19 of the ICCPR. The right to freedom of expression extends to the communication of information or ideas through any medium, including written and oral communications, the media, public protest, broadcasting, artistic works and commercial advertising.<sup>25</sup>

2.63 The right to freedom of expression may be subject to limitations that are necessary to protect the rights or reputations of others, national security, public order, or public health or morals. In order for a limitation to be permissible under international human rights law, limitations must be prescribed by law, pursue a legitimate objective, be rationally connected to the achievement of that objective and be a proportionate means of achieving that objective.<sup>26</sup>

2.64 The initial human rights analysis stated that, by providing that certain signs cannot be displayed and providing that union logos, insignias and mottos are not to be applied to certain clothing or equipment, the measures engage and limit the right to freedom of expression.<sup>27</sup> The statement of compatibility acknowledges that the right to freedom of expression is engaged and identifies the following as the objective of the measures:

The intimidation of employees to join or not join a building association is clearly an unacceptable infringement on their right to freedom of association...

The right to freedom of association can also be infringed by the presence of building association logos, mottos or indicia on clothing, property or equipment that is supplied by, or which provision is made for by, the code covered entity...

...pursuing the legitimate policy objective of protecting the rights and freedoms of employees in the building and construction industry to choose to become, or not become, a member of a building association and ensuring that this choice does not impact on an employee's ability to work on a particular site.<sup>28</sup>

2.65 As the initial analysis stated, the statement of compatibility provides limited information about the importance of these objectives. However, to be capable of justifying a proposed limitation on human rights, a legitimate objective must address a pressing or substantial concern and not simply seek an outcome regarded as desirable or convenient.<sup>29</sup>

2.66 Furthermore, the reasoning articulated in the statement of compatibility does not accurately reflect the scope of freedom of association under international law. The scope of the right to freedom of association in a workplace under international law focuses on a positive right to associate rather than a right not to associate.<sup>30</sup> ILO supervisory mechanisms have found that under Convention 87 it is a matter for each nation state to decide whether it is appropriate to guarantee the ability of workers not to join a union.<sup>31</sup> It was stated in the previous analysis that, as a matter of international human rights law, the display of particular union signs, union logos, mottos or indicia on clothing did not appear to 'infringe' the right to freedom of association but rather constitutes an element of this right.<sup>32</sup>

2.67 The statement of compatibility provides the following information on whether the measure prohibiting certain signs (contained in section 13(2)(b)-(c)) is effective to achieve the stated objective:

...intimidation can take the form of signs implying that employees who are not members of a building association cannot work on the building site or, where such employees are present, seek to intimidate, harass or vilify such employees...

2.68 However, as the initial analysis stated, the statement of compatibility does not address how the display of specific signs rises to the level of intimidation, harassment or vilification. Without further information it is unclear how the removal of such signs would be effective in achieving the stated objective of protecting the choice to become, or not become, a member of a union.

2.69 The statement of compatibility further provides the following information on whether the measure prohibiting union logos, mottos or indicia on certain clothing, property or equipment (contained in section 13(2)(j)) is effective to achieve the stated objective:

... [union] signage on clothing or equipment that is supplied by a code covered entity carries a strong implication that membership of the building association in question is being actively encouraged or endorsed by the relevant employer and is against the principle that employees should be free to choose whether to become or not become a member of a building association.<sup>33</sup>

2.70 In the initial human rights analysis, it was acknowledged that the explanatory statement outlines the findings of the final report of the Royal Commission into

Trade Union Governance and Corruption (the Heydon Royal Commission) including general issues of intimidation in the building and construction industry.<sup>34</sup> However, it is not evident how merely viewing, for example, a union logo on clothing or equipment would prevent an employee who did not wish to join the relevant union from their choice to do so or from working on a particular site. Nor was it evident that such signs and logos would necessarily be seen as an employer endorsement of joining the union, and even if so, that this would affect an employee's freedom of choice or ability to decide not to join the union.

2.71 In relation to the proportionality of the measure prohibiting union logos, mottos or indicia on certain clothing, property or equipment (contained in section 13(2)(j)), the statement of compatibility provides that:

This prohibition only applies to clothing, property or equipment that is supplied by, or which provision is made for by, the code covered entity. Section 13 would not prevent these items from being applied to clothing, property or equipment that was supplied by other individuals at the site or by the relevant building association.<sup>35</sup>

2.72 No further information is provided in the statement of compatibility about the proportionality of the measures including any relevant safeguards in relation to the right to freedom of expression.

2.73 The initial analysis therefore raised questions as to the compatibility of the measures with the right to freedom of expression. Accordingly, the committee sought the advice of the Minister for Employment as to:

- whether there is reasoning or evidence that establishes that the stated objective addresses a pressing or substantial concern or whether the proposed changes are otherwise aimed at achieving a legitimate objective;
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) that objective;
- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve that objective (including findings by relevant international supervisory mechanisms about whether the limitation is permissible); and
- whether consultation has occurred with the relevant workers' and employers' organisations in relation to the measure.

Minister's initial response – compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of expression

2.74 In relation to the objective of the measure, the minister's response stated:

35 ES, SOC, p. 8.

The Statement of Compatibility with Human Rights for the 2016 Code states that these measures are reasonable, necessary and proportionate in pursuit of the legitimate policy objective of protecting the rights and freedoms of employees in the building and construction industry to choose to become, or not become, a member of a building association and ensure that this choice does not impact on an employee's ability to work on a particular site.

2.75 The minister's response responded to the analysis in the initial report which noted that the reasoning articulated in the statement of compatibility does not accurately reflect the scope of freedom of association under international law which focuses on a right to associate:

With regard to the stated objective, the Committee has noted that the ILO supervisory mechanisms have found that under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention 1948 (No. 87) it is a matter for each nation state to decide whether it is appropriate to guarantee the right not to join a union. It is clear from the provisions of Part 3-1 of the Fair Work Act 2009 – as implemented by the then Federal Labor Government – that Australia has decided it is appropriate to also guarantee the right not to join a union.

2.76 As stated in the initial analysis, Australia is entitled as a matter of domestic law to decide it is appropriate to regulate the right not to join a union. This does not mean that steps taken to enable persons not join a union are automatically human rights compatible. Rather, Australia must ensure that any such steps taken only impose limitations on the right to freedom of expression that are permissible under international law. Accordingly, the committee is required to examine the measure against Australia's obligations under human rights law.

2.77 In relation to whether the objective of guaranteeing the ability not to join a union addresses a pressing and substantial concern, the minister's initial response stated:

These measures are necessary to protect the right to join or not to join a union because of the pervasive culture that exists within the building and construction industry in Australia in which it is understood that there is such a thing as a 'union site' and on those sites all workers are expected to be members of a building association. Evidence of the existence of this culture can be found in many decisions of the courts, including most recently:

- In Australian Building and Construction Commissioner v Barker & Anor [2017] FCCA 1143 the Federal Circuit Court was satisfied that two workers had been deprived of their right to work and earn income for two days when, on 28 January 2016, they were told by Mr Barker, a CFMEU official in the role of shop steward/delegate, that they could not work on the project unless they paid union fees. When a site manager informed Mr Barker that the workers had a right not to be in a union, Mr Barker replied 'No, everybody's got to be in the union, this is an EBA site, it's in your EBA that they all have to be on site in the union and have an EBA.'

- In Australian Building and Construction Commissioner v Moses & Ors (2017] FCCA 738 the Federal Circuit Court was satisfied that CFMEU organiser Mr Moses, accompanied by a CFMEU delegate, threatened workers at Queensland's Gladstone Broadwalk [sic] project to the effect that if they did not join the CFMEU then no work would occur by the workers that day and they would be removed from the project. He told the workers that if they wanted to work on the project, which was a union site, they would have to join the CFMEU.
- In Director of the Fair Work Building Industry Inspectorate v Vink & Anor [2016] FCCA 488 a CFMEU official was found to have entered a construction site and, in an incident described as "sheer thuggery" by the Court, removed workers' belongings from the site shed, including lunches from the refrigerator. The Court concluded the conduct on site was intended "to give a clear message to all employees that benefits on the work site would only be afforded to members of the union."

2.78 The minister's response argued that contraventions show that stronger measures beyond those contained in the Fair Work Act 2009 are needed. Based on the information provided, protecting the ability not to join a union would appear to be a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law.

2.79 The minister's response further explained the need for the measures:

The display of signs asserting that non-union members will not be permitted to work on a particular site, or that seek to vilify or harass employees who do not participate in industrial activities, along with the presence of union logos, mottos or indicia on clothing, property or equipment issued or provided for by the employer gives workers a strong impression that not only is union membership compulsory for anyone that wishes to work on the particular site, but that relevant employers support this position.

In addition, in relation to signs that seek to vilify or harass employees who participate, or do not participate, in industrial activities I note that the ILO supervisory mechanisms have recognised that trade union organisations should respect the limits of propriety and not use insulting language in their communications.

2.80 In this respect, it was noted that prohibiting insulting language or communication for the purpose of protecting the right of employees not to join a union still constitutes a limitation on the right to freedom of expression that needs to be justifiable.

2.81 The minister further advised, in relation to the proportionality of the limitation on the right to freedom of expression, that the:

...limitation is clearly reasonable and proportionate in pursuit of the legitimate objective explained given the culture of the building industry and the ongoing threats to freedom of association by certain building unions. For example, they do not prevent posters and signs that merely encourage or convey the benefits of union membership or communicate other union information from being displayed on a site, nor do they prevent workers from applying union logos, mottos or indicia to their own personal clothing, property or equipment.

2.82 However, the minister's response did not demonstrate that there are no less rights restrictive approaches reasonably available to achieve the stated objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose not to join a union. For example, the minister's response did not address whether providing education about the current protections contained in the Fair Work Act 2009, or better monitoring or enforcement against existing measures in the Fair Work Act 2009 had been considered as alternatives, or whether the measure was sufficiently circumscribed so as to be a proportionate rights limitation.

2.83 Finally, as noted above, the minister's response outlined a number of examples of consultation which occurred with employer organisations and unions. Consultation processes are relevant to an assessment of the measure, and may assist in determining whether a limitation is the least rights restrictive means of pursuing a legitimate objective on the available evidence. However, the previous analysis of the minister's initial response stated that, the fact of consultation alone was not sufficient to address the human rights concerns in relation to the measure.

2.84 In light of the ongoing questions regarding the proportionality of the measure, the committee sought the minister's further advice as to whether there are less rights restrictive approaches to achieve the stated objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose not to join a union (in particular, providing education about the current protections contained in the Fair Work Act, or better monitoring or enforcement).

Initial human rights analysis - compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of association and the right to form and join trade unions

2.85 Article 22 of the ICCPR guarantees the right to freedom of association generally, and also explicitly guarantees everyone 'the right to form trade unions for the protection of [their] interests'. Article 8 of the ICESCR also guarantees the right of everyone to form trade unions. As set out above, the right to freedom of association may only be subject to limitations that are necessary to protect the rights or reputations of others, national security, public order, or public health or morals. Generally, to be capable of justifying a limit on human rights, the measure must address a legitimate objective, be rationally connected to that objective and be a proportionate way to achieve that objective.<sup>36</sup> Further, no limitations on this right are permissible if they are inconsistent with the rights contained in ILO Convention No. 87.<sup>37</sup>

2.86 As noted above, the understanding of the right to freedom of association expressed in the statement of compatibility and the code of conduct does not fully reflect the content of this right as a matter of international human rights law. The ILO supervisory mechanisms have noted, for example, that 'the prohibition of the placing of posters stating the point of view of a central trade union organization is an unacceptable restriction on trade union activities'.<sup>38</sup> As the measures restrict communication about union membership, including joining a union, the measures engage and may limit the right to freedom of association. This potential limitation was not addressed in the statement of compatibility.

2.87 Noting that the measure engages and may limit the right to freedom of association, the committee therefore sought the advice of the minister as to:

- whether the measure is aimed at achieving a legitimate objective for the purposes of human rights law;
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) that objective; and
- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve the stated objective.

Minister's initial response – compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of association and the right to form and join trade unions

2.88 In relation to the compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of association under international human rights law, the minister's response relied upon the information set out above at [2.77], relating to court findings against union conduct, as indicative of building industry practice.

2.89 The minister's response did not substantially address this issue with respect to the right to freedom of association as it is understood in international law. In order to justify limiting this right, which relevantly includes the right to engage in communication about union membership, it is necessary to identify why the existing law is insufficient to address the type of conduct with which the minister is concerned, such that the proposed measure is necessary. Further, as set out above at [2.82], while the measure may pursue the legitimate objective of protecting the ability not to join a trade union, less rights restrictive alternatives appear available to pursue this objective. Further, as noted above, the UNCESCR has recently raised specific human rights concerns in relation to the code.

2.90 The committee therefore sought the minister's further advice as to whether there are less rights restrictive approaches to achieve the stated objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose not to join a union (in particular, providing education about the current protections contained in the Fair Work Act, or better monitoring or enforcement).

Minister's second response – compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of expression and the right to freedom of association

2.91 The minister's second response collectively addresses the committee's questions as to the human rights compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of expression and the right to freedom of association.

2.92 In relation to the compatibility of the measure with these rights the minister's further response relies upon information previously provided as to the 'culture' of the building and construction industry, court findings and examples which the response argues 'demonstrate that the Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (CFMEU) has repeatedly contravened laws that protect freedom of association and does not respect the right of individuals to choose whether or not to join a union'. The minister also provides additional information about further court decisions since her initial response which she argues 'provide[s] additional evidence of the persistent culture of the [construction] industry'. As acknowledged above, based on the information provided, protecting the ability not to join a union would appear to be a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law.

2.93 In relation to the proportionality of the limitation on the right to freedom of association and the right to freedom of expression and whether there are less rights restrictive approaches to achieve the stated objective, the minister's response states:

Other approaches, such as education and better monitoring and enforcement, are also useful and are encouraged. In fact, the Australian Building and Construction Commission (the ABCC), and its predecessors have long recognised the important role education plays in increasing rates of compliance and self-regulation. They have assisted building industry participants to understand how the relevant workplace laws protect the right of individuals to join or not join a union. They have also published details about the outcome of litigation commenced against unions and employers for alleged breaches of freedom of association protections.

Since 2005 there has been a building industry specific regulator with functions that include monitoring and investigating compliance with relevant workplace laws and pursuing enforcement activities in relation to alleged contraventions. From late 2013 the ABCC's predecessor, Fair Work Building and Construction (FWBC), renewed its focus on identifying, investigating and pursuing particular types of unlawful conduct, including alleged breaches of freedom of association protections. However, despite the concerted effort by FWBC to enforce the freedom of association protections in the Fair Work Act (which has been continued by the ABCC), these protections continue to be breached by unions and employers, as evidenced in my response to the Committee of 3 July 2017. It is therefore clear that education, monitoring and enforcement activities alone are insufficient to bring about the cultural change required to protect the right of individuals to choose whether or not to join a union.

That is why it is considered necessary to complement these activities with provisions that require code covered entities to ensure that 'no ticket, no start' signs or signs that seek to vilify or harass employees who do not participate in industrial activities are not displayed on their sites, and that union logos, mottos and insignia aren't applied to clothing, property or equipment issued or provided for by employers. These provisions seek to eliminate visual cues on sites that give a strong impression that union membership is compulsory or is being actively encouraged or endorsed by the employer and to challenge the custom and practice ingrained in the industry.

2.94 Accordingly, the minister's response indicates that education and better monitoring or enforcement have an important role to play, but have been insufficient to address the type of conduct referred to in the minister's response.

2.95 In considering the proportionality of the measure, it is relevant that the display of posters conveying the benefits of union membership will not be prohibited and that workers will still be able to display union logos on their own personal clothing. Despite these exceptions, it remains the case that the limitation on freedom of expression is extensive. Signs which challenge non-union members, for example, for breaking a strike or not taking part in industrial action, may be uncomfortable or harassing but nonetheless be the expression of genuinely held views. The prohibition on expressing these views in the relevant workplace appears an overbroad limitation on the ability of individuals to exercise their freedoms of expression and association, in pursuit of the stated objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose not to join a union. Prohibiting the application of union logos to employer supplied or required clothing also risks being overbroad, noting that in some workplaces this may include a significant portion of existing clothing and equipment. As stated in the previous analysis, as a matter of international human rights law, the display of particular union signs, union logos, mottos or indicia on clothing does not 'infringe' the right to freedom of association but rather constitutes an element of this right.<sup>39</sup> Relevantly, international supervisory bodies have expressed concerns, from the perspective of the right to freedom of expression and the right to freedom of association, regarding measures which restrict the display of union posters or signs in the workplace.<sup>40</sup>

2.96 The committee noted that the minister's further response did not provide sufficient information to conclude that the measure is a proportionate limitation on human rights. The committee considered that, in the absence of additional information addressing the proportionality of the measures, the measures are likely to be incompatible with the right to freedom of association and the right to freedom of expression under international law.

2.97 In light of the analysis outlined in relation to the measures concerning freedom of expression and the right to freedom of association, the committee sought the minister's further advice as to whether there are less rights restrictive approaches to achieve the stated objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose not to join a union.

Minister's third response – compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of expression and the right to freedom of association

2.98 In relation to this question, the minister's response provides the following information:

The Committee has sought my advice as to whether there are 'less rights restrictive approaches' than those in paragraphs 13(2)(b), (c) and (j) of the 2016 Code to achieve the stated objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose not to join a union.

In my responses to the Committee on 3 July 2017 and 5 October 2017 I outlined extensive material regarding the coercive culture that exists within the building and construction industry in which it is understood that there is such a thing as a 'union site' and on those sites all workers are expected to be members of a building association, whether voluntary or not. This included (but was not limited to) a number of findings by courts. Further decisions have been handed down since my last response of 5 October 2017 in which the Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (CFMEU) has repeatedly engaged in conduct that reinforces the coercive culture that an individual must be a union member:

- In October 2017 the Federal Court found the CFMEU in 2015 through its delegate, engaged in adverse action when that delegate prevented a subcontractor's employee from working on site because he was not a union member and prevented the same employee from performing work on site with intent to coerce him to become a union member. The CFMEU also engaged in coercion when the delegate insisted a second employee of the subcontractor pay fees to join the CFMEU. In imposing fines of $90,000 on the CFMEU and $8,000 on the delegate, Justice Tracey stated that ...the Commissioner has identified 15 cases, since 2000, in which the CFMEU and its officials have been found to have contravened the Act and its predecessors by engaging in misconduct with a view to maintaining "no ticket no start" regimes' ...and that the delegate 'arrogated to himself the right to determine who would and would not work on the site in order to advance the 'no ticket no start' regime ...'. Justice Tracey also observed that the CFMEU did not provide any assurance that 'it will direct its shop stewards not to seek to enforce "no ticket, no start" regimes and to respect the freedom of association provisions ...' (Australian Building and Construction Commissioner v Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (Werribee Shopping Centre Case) [2017] FCA 1235).

40 See, ILO, Freedom of Association: Digest of decisions and principles of the Freedom of Association Committee of the Governing Body of the ILO, Fifth revised edition (2006) [162]-[163].

- In November 2017, the Federal Court found a CFMEU shop steward in 2014 knowingly made false representations when, upon learning two employees of a subcontractor were non-paying CFMEU members, told the first employee 'You need to fix it. I can't let you work if you're not paid up' and the second '...you can't work in here ...This job is a union site'. The court also found that in making the false representation and refusing the first employee to work on site a few days later, the shop steward engaged in coercion and adverse action against that employee. His Honour also found the CFMEU to be vicariously liable for the actions of the shop steward. The Court is yet to consider the matter of penalties against the shop steward and the CFMEU (Australian Building and Construction Commission v Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (The Quest Apartments Case) [2017] FCA 1398).

The Committee has asserted the provisions are an overbroad limitation on freedoms of expression and association in protecting an individual's right to choose not to join a union. The Committee must however consider the context in which these provisions were introduced and operate. As can be seen from the many decisions of the courts, the CFMEU had promoted, and continues to persistently promote, a coercive culture in which a person cannot engage in a day's work if they are not a union member.

As was set out in my previous responses alternative approaches to address and challenge the custom and practice ingrained in the industry such as education and better mentoring and enforcement have been employed by the Australian Building and Construction Commission and its predecessors. It would be preferable if such approaches on their own were capable of making a difference to the ingrained practice. However, as I concluded in my response of 5 October 2017, it is clear that these approaches alone have not been sufficient (and in my view will continue [to] not be sufficient in the immediate future) to bring about the culture change required to protect the right of individuals to choose whether or not to join a union.

It is in the context of a persistent coercive culture that has not responded to more traditional approaches to protecting freedom of association that the provisions in section 13 are necessary and proportionate. As I have stated in the previous responses, these provisions do not seek to eliminate all forms of expression in relation to union membership. Posters merely encouraging or conveying the benefits of union membership are not prohibited and an individual can display logos on their own personal clothing. The provisions are intended to eliminate visual cues that serve to reinforce the idea of 'union sites'; that is, signs that are directed at harassing or vilifying an individual on the basis of their participation or non-participation in industrial activities; 'no ticket, no start' signs; and union logos, mottos or indicia on employer clothing, property or equipment.

An individual can still seek to express their genuinely held views about industrial action without necessarily making an individual feel coerced into joining or not joining an association. As such it cannot in my view be asserted, as the Committee has done, that the 'limitation on freedom of expression is extensive'. With respect, the Committee's characterisation of the issue, that prohibiting 'insulting language or communication' for the purpose of achieving the stated objective still constitutes a limitation on the right to freedom of expression, trivialises a very real issue for those actually in the building and construction workforce.

The provisions are in my view absolutely essential in addressing the persuasive culture in the building and construction industry and achieving the objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose to join or not to join a union.

2.99 The minister's third response provides a range of further information which addresses questions related to the proportionality of the limitation in context. The response points to a range of serious conduct being dealt with by the courts relating to the ability of persons to choose not to join a union. In this context, as acknowledged above, protecting the ability not to join a union would appear to be a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law.

2.100 In relation to the proportionality of the measure, the minister reiterates information she previously provided about the extent and scope of the limitation including exceptions. The view outlined in the committee's previous report that the limitation on the right to freedom of association and the right to freedom of expression was potentially extensive and appeared to be insufficiently circumscribed was based on an assessment of the measures in light of the scope of these rights and international jurisprudence. Identifying and assessing these limitations is in accordance with the committee's mandate under the Human Rights (Parliamentary Scrutiny Act) 2011 and is different to an assessment of the broader policy merits of the measures. Relevantly, as noted above, international supervisory bodies have expressed concerns, from the perspective of the right to freedom of expression and the right to freedom of association, regarding measures which restrict the display of union posters or signs in the workplace.

2.101 Further, the minister's response does not clearly articulate how the proposed measure is the least rights restrictive approach to achieving this objective. While relevant, the fact there are court cases which are dealing with such conduct including imposing fines does not necessarily mean the measure in the code is the least rights restrictive. The minister's third response states that less rights restrictive approaches such as education and better monitoring or enforcement have been insufficient to address the stated objective. However, the minister does not fully explain the extent to which other less rights restrictive approaches have been considered or explain what these approaches were. Accordingly, the measure as formulated may not be the least rights restrictive approach.

Committee response

2.102 The committee thanks the minister for her response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.103 The preceding analysis indicates that the measure may be incompatible with the right to freedom of association and the right to freedom of expression under international law.

Background

2.104 The committee first reported on the Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Bill 2017 (the bill) and the Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse (Consequential Amendments) Bill 2017 in its Report 13 of 2017, and requested a response from the Minister for Social Services by 20 December 2017.<sup>1</sup>

2.105 The minister's response to the committee's inquiries was received on 20 December 2017. The response is discussed below and is reproduced in full at Appendix 3.

2.106 The minister explained, by way of background, that the bill is a 'first step to encourage jurisdictions to opt-in to the Scheme, and has been designed in anticipation of their participation should a referral of powers be received'. If the states agree to provide a referral of power to participate in the scheme from its commencement, the minister intends to replace the bill with a National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Bill 2017 (the national bill).

Eligibility to receive redress under the Commonwealth Redress Scheme

2.107 The bill seeks to establish a redress scheme (the scheme) for survivors of institutional child sexual abuse.

1 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Report 13 of 2017 (5 December 2017) pp. 2-16.

2.108 A person is eligible for redress under the scheme if the person was sexually abused, that sexual abuse is within the scope of the scheme, and the person is an Australian citizen or permanent resident.<sup>2</sup> Proposed subsections 16(2) and (3) of the bill provide that the proposed Commonwealth Redress Scheme Rules (the rules) may also prescribe that a person is eligible or not eligible for redress under the scheme.<sup>3</sup>

Compatibility of the measure with the right to equality and non-discrimination

2.109 The right to equality and non-discrimination in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) provides that everyone is entitled to enjoy their rights without discrimination of any kind, and that all people are equal before the law and entitled without discrimination to the equal and non-discriminatory protection of the law.<sup>4</sup> Article 2 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) further provides that states parties to the CRC must respect and ensure the right to equality and non-discrimination specifically in relation to children.

2.110 'Discrimination' encompasses both measures that have a discriminatory intent (direct discrimination) and measures which have a discriminatory effect on the enjoyment of rights (indirect discrimination). The UN Human Rights Committee has explained indirect discrimination as 'a rule or measure that is neutral on its face or without intent to discriminate', which exclusively or disproportionately affects people with a particular personal attribute.<sup>5</sup>

2.111 As acknowledged in the statement of compatibility, by precluding persons who are not Australian citizens or permanent residents from being eligible for the scheme, the restrictions on eligibility discriminate on the basis of nationality or national origin.

2.112 Persons who are the victim of violations of human rights within Australia's jurisdiction are entitled to a remedy for breaches of those rights irrespective of their residency or citizenship status.<sup>6</sup> However, differential treatment will not constitute unlawful discrimination if the differential treatment is based on reasonable and objective criteria such that it serves a legitimate objective, is rationally connected to that legitimate objective and is a proportionate means of achieving that objective.

2 See proposed section 16 of the bill.

3 Proposed section 117(1) of the bill provides that the minister may, by legislative instrument, make rules prescribing matters required or permitted by the bill to be prescribed by the rules, or necessary or convenient to be prescribed for carrying out or giving effect to the bill.

4 The prohibited grounds of discrimination are race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status. Under 'other status' the following have been held to qualify as prohibited grounds: age, nationality, marital status, disability, place of residence within a country and sexual orientation. The prohibited grounds of discrimination are often described as 'personal attributes'.

5 Althammer v Austria, HRC 998/01, [10.2]

6 For a further discussion of the right to an effective remedy, see below.

2.113 The statement of compatibility explains that the restrictions on eligibility of non-citizens and non-permanent residents are necessary to achieving legitimate aims of ensuring the scheme receives public support and protecting against large scale fraud. In relation to the latter, the minister explains:

Non-citizens and non-permanent residents...will be ineligible to ensure the integrity of the Scheme. Verification of identity documents for non-citizens and non-permanent residents would be very difficult. Opening the Scheme to all people overseas could result in organised overseas groups lodging large scale volumes of false claims in attempts to defraud the Scheme, which could overwhelm the Scheme's resources and delay the processing of legitimate applications.<sup>7</sup>

2.114 The initial analysis stated that the objective of ensuring the integrity of a scheme to provide redress for victims of sexual abuse (such as protection against fraudulent claims) may be capable of being a legitimate objective for the purposes of human rights law, but the statement of compatibility did not provide sufficient information about the importance of this objective in the specific context of the measure. In order to show that the measure constitutes a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law, a reasoned and evidence-based explanation of why the measure addresses a substantial and pressing concern is required. It was noted that reducing administrative burdens or administrative inconvenience alone will generally be insufficient for the purposes of permissibly limiting human rights under international human rights law. It was also not clear whether there was evidence to suggest that large scale volumes of attempted fraud of the scheme may arise if non-citizens were included in the scheme, noting that the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse concluded that it saw 'no need for any citizenship, residency or other requirements, whether at the time of the abuse or at the time of the application for redress'.<sup>8</sup>

2.115 In relation to the proportionality of the measure, the statement of compatibility noted that it will be possible to deem additional classes of people eligible for redress under the rules. The statement of compatibility explains that:

This rulemaking power may be used to deem the following groups of non-citizen, non-permanent residents eligible: those currently living in Australia, those who were child migrants, and those who were formerly Australian citizens or permanent residents.<sup>9</sup>

7 Statement of Compatibility (SOC), p. 70.

8 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, Redress and Civil Litigation Report (2015), p. 347.

9 SOC, pp. 69-70.

2.116 It was not clear from the information provided why it is necessary to include these classes of eligibility in a separate legislative instrument,<sup>10</sup> rather than in the primary legislation. Inclusion in the primary legislation of the classes of non-nationals foreshadowed in the statement of compatibility as being likely to be ruled eligible by the minister may be a less rights-restrictive means of achieving the stated objective of the measure.

2.117 The committee therefore sought the advice of the minister as to:

- whether the restriction on non-citizens' and non-permanent residents' eligibility for redress under the scheme is aimed at achieving a legitimate objective for the purposes of human rights law (including any information or evidence to explain why the measure addresses a pressing and substantial concern);
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) that objective; and
- whether the restriction on non-citizens' and non-permanent residents' eligibility for the scheme is proportionate to achieve the stated objective (including whether there are less rights-restrictive means available to achieve the stated objective).

Minister's response

2.118 In relation to whether the restriction on non-citizens' and non-permanent residents' eligibility for redress under the scheme is aimed at achieving a legitimate objective, the minister's response states that, as the scheme is voluntary, it is important that the scheme provide 'appropriate architecture to support its integrity and legitimacy' to ensure maximum participation from institutions which, in turn, will maximise the opportunity for survivors to seek redress. The minister explained the difficulties of identifying and verifying the identity of those making the claim in the context of non-citizens and non-permanent residents as follows:

A core principle of the Scheme is to ensure redress is paid to those who are eligible. It is important that the Scheme can identify and verify the identity of those making a claim...

Given the comparative size of the monetary payments under the Scheme and the relatively low evidentiary burden that will be required of survivors making applications, the risk of fraud is a key concern. Verification of proof of identity is one means by which the Scheme can limit attempted fraud. Opening eligibility to non-citizens and non-permanent residents would significantly increase the difficulty of proof of identity verification for those applicants and increase overall processing times of applications.

10 The power to determine eligibility by way of legislative instrument will be discussed further below in relation to the right to an effective remedy.

Verification of identity of those who are non-citizens and non-permanent residents would require primary documentation and verification from foreign governments and Australian embassies.

...large volumes of false claims from organised overseas groups could overwhelm the Scheme's resources and delay the processing of legitimate applications. In this regard, the Commonwealth Government is continually undertaking fraud detection work to ensure the integrity of social security payments and there is evidence of organised crime attempting to defraud the Commonwealth. However, providing evidence of this nature to the committee may compromise fraud detection activities.

2.119 In response to the committee's concern that reducing administrative burdens is generally insufficient to constitute a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law, the minister explained the importance of timely decision-making in the context of the bill as follows:

...however I would emphasise that the nature of the survivor cohort is such that timeliness in processing Scheme applications is critical. Over half of the survivors anticipated to apply to the Scheme are over the age of 50, and so significant delays to the processing of applications may result in survivors passing away before they have the opportunity to apply for or accept redress. It is widely recognised that survivors of child sexual abuse also experience poorer health and social outcomes, amplifying the need for timely decision-making and for promoting the rights of survivors.

It is important that our policy settings support the integrity and appropriate targeting of payments. Should the Scheme not safeguard against potential fraud, institutions may choose not to participate, or may seek to leave the Scheme.

2.120 The minister's response provides reasoning and an evidence-based explanation of how the measure addresses a substantial and pressing concern. The information provided in the minister's response indicates that the measure is likely to pursue a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law. Restricting eligibility criteria of non-citizens and non-permanent residents also appears to be rationally connected to the stated objective.

2.121 As to whether the limitation is proportionate to achieving the stated objective, the minister's response notes that it is necessary for the classes of non-citizens referred to in the explanatory memorandum to be contained in a separate legislative instrument because investigation and consultation is continuing across government and with states and territories to determine if there are other classes of survivors that do not fit within the citizenship requirements that should be deemed eligible for the scheme. The minister further explains:

There may also be classes of survivors that will apply for redress that the Scheme has not, or could not, envisage including in the legislation. The Scheme may not have accounted for categories of survivors that it needs to deal with promptly, to ensure the timely processing of applications and the best outcomes for survivors so subclause 16(2) of the Commonwealth Bill is necessary to allow the Scheme to respond to situations as they arise....

Restricting the eligibility of non-citizens and non-permanent residents is necessary to achieve the legitimate aims of ensuring that survivors are provided the redress to which they are entitled in a timely manner, and that redress is provided only to those who submit genuine claims. Subsection 16(2) of the Commonwealth Bill will allow discretion to deem categories of survivors eligible despite these restrictions, such as child migrants. This ensures that the limitation of survivors' rights is proportionate.

I am considering the committee's suggestion to include these predetermined cases in primary legislation in the context of any future legislation developed to reflect a national redress Scheme.

2.122 The concern as to the proportionality of precluding non-citizens and non-permanent residents from being eligible for the scheme is informed by the conclusion of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse that it saw 'no need for any citizenship, residency or other requirements, whether at the time of the abuse or at the time of the application for redress'.<sup>11</sup> As victims of violations of human rights within Australia's jurisdiction are entitled to a remedy for breaches of those rights irrespective of their residency or citizenship status, there are concerns that some survivors of child sexual abuse that would otherwise be eligible for the scheme may lose access to a remedy. However, as the minister's response explains, the power to determine in the rules further classes of persons eligible for redress notwithstanding the citizenship and residency requirements may address these concerns. If the bill is passed, the committee will consider the human rights implications of the rules once they are received.

Committee response

2.123 The committee thanks the minister for his response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.124 The preceding analysis indicates that restricting the eligibility of non-citizens and non-permanent residents engages and limits the right to equality and non-discrimination. While the measure pursues a legitimate objective, there are concerns that the breadth of the restriction on the eligibility of all non-citizens and non-permanent residents may not be proportionate. However, setting out further classes of persons who may be eligible in the proposed redress scheme rules, including those who would otherwise be excluded due to not being citizens or permanent residents, may be capable of addressing these concerns. If the bill is passed, the committee will consider the human rights implications of the legislative instrument once it is received.

2.125 The committee notes that the minister has indicated he will consider including further classes of persons who will be eligible for the scheme in any future legislation developed to reflect a national redress scheme.

Compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy for breaches of human rights

2.126 Article 2(3) of the ICCPR requires State parties to ensure that persons whose human rights have been violated have access to an effective remedy. States parties are required to establish appropriate judicial and administrative mechanisms for addressing claims of human rights violations under domestic law, and to make reparation to individuals whose rights have been violated. Effective remedies can involve restitution, rehabilitation and measures of satisfaction – such as public apologies, public memorials, guarantees of non-repetition and changes in relevant laws and practices – as well as bringing to justice the perpetrators of human rights violations. Such remedies should be appropriately adapted to take account of the special vulnerabilities of certain categories of persons, including, and particularly, children.

2.127 The redress scheme seeks to provide remedies in response to historical failures of the Commonwealth and other government and non-government organisations to uphold human rights obligations, including the right of every child to protection by society and the state,<sup>12</sup> and the right of every child to protection from all forms of physical and mental violence, injury or abuse (including sexual exploitation and abuse).<sup>13</sup> As acknowledged in the statement of compatibility, by implementing a redress scheme for victims who were sexually abused as children, the scheme promotes the right to state-supported recovery for child victims of neglect, exploitation and abuse under article 39 of the CRC.<sup>14</sup>

2.128 The power in proposed subsections 16(2) and (3) to determine eligibility by way of the proposed rules is broad and, in particular, the minister has a very broad power to determine persons to be ineligible for the scheme. It was noted in the initial analysis that in media reports concerning the introduction of the bill, the minister foreshadowed that he proposes to exclude persons from being eligible if they have been convicted of sex offences, or sentenced to prison terms of five years or more for crimes such as serious drug, homicide or fraud offences.<sup>15</sup>

2.129 International human rights law jurisprudence states that laws conferring discretion or rule-making powers on the executive must indicate with sufficient clarity the scope of any such power or discretion conferred on competent authorities and the manner of its exercise.<sup>16</sup> This is because, without sufficient safeguards, broad powers may be exercised in such a way as to be incompatible with human rights. The initial analysis noted that the breadth of the power to determine eligibility or ineligibility contained in the bill may therefore engage and limit the right of survivors of sexual abuse to an effective remedy. The statement of compatibility does not acknowledge that the right to an effective remedy is engaged by this aspect of the bill.<sup>17</sup>

2.130 While the statement of compatibility discusses limiting eligibility of persons on the basis of survivors' nationality and residency status,<sup>18</sup> no information is provided in the statement of compatibility as to the rationale for a broad power to determine eligibility or ineligibility by way of the proposed rules. As limited information has been provided in the statement of compatibility on this point, it is not possible to determine the extent to which the right to an effective remedy may be engaged and limited by this aspect of the bill, and whether such a limitation is permissible.

2.131 The committee therefore sought the advice of the minister as to the compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy.

Minister's response

2.132 In relation to the rationale for using the rules to provide for further classes of eligibility or ineligibility rather than the primary legislation, the minister explained:

The Scheme is designed to be responsive to survivors' and participating institutions' needs. Flexibility is needed to allow adjustments for the differing needs of survivors, participating institutions, and to enable the Scheme to quickly implement changes required to ensure positive outcomes for survivors. This is why it is necessary for elements of the Scheme to be in delegated legislation.

Using rules, rather than regulations or incorporating all elements of the Scheme in the Commonwealth Bill, provides appropriate flexibility and enables the Scheme to respond to factual matters as they arise. It is uncertain how many applications for redress the Scheme will receive at its commencement, and whether there will be unforeseen issues requiring prompt responses. It is therefore appropriate that aspects of the Scheme be covered by rules that can be adapted and modified in a timely manner. The need to respond quickly to survivor needs is also a key feature of the Scheme as many survivors have waited decades for recognition and justice.

2.133 Responding quickly and with flexibility to survivors' needs and seeking to ensure positive outcomes for survivors in the redress scheme is relevant to providing an effective remedy for violations of human rights.

2.134 As to how the power is proposed to be exercised, the minister explained that subsection 16(3) would be used in 'exceptional circumstances', excluding persons from the scheme if they have been convicted of sex offences, or sentenced to prison terms of five years or more for crimes such as serious drug, homicide or fraud offences. In relation to this proposed exclusion, the minister explained:

As the committee rightly highlights, this significant matter should not be delegated to subordinate legislation. The limitation on eligibility for persons with criminal convictions will therefore be included in the primary legislation of the proposed National Bill. There could be a perception that the Commonwealth Bill limits the rights to effective remedy for survivors with criminal convictions. However, the decision was made that in order to give integrity and public confidence to the Scheme, there had to be some limitations for applications from people who themselves had committed serious offences, but particularly sexual offences.

The eligibility policy has been developed in consultation with State and Territory Attorneys-General, who were almost unanimous in their view that reasonable limitations on applications is necessary to have public faith and confidence in the Scheme. Excluding some people based on serious criminal offences is necessary to ensure taxpayer money is not used to pay redress to those who may not meet prevailing community standards.

2.135 Noting Australia's obligation to provide effective remedies for victims of human rights violations, any proposed restrictions on eligibility on persons with criminal records will need to be carefully considered. In this respect, the UN Human Rights Committee has stated that the right to an effective remedy is an obligation inherent in the ICCPR as a whole and so, while limitations may be placed in particular circumstances on the nature of the remedy provided (judicial or otherwise), there is an absolute obligation to provide a remedy that is effective.<sup>19</sup>

2.136 Relevantly, in relation to the matters raised by the minister, the Final Report noted the impact of child sexual abuse on a survivor may manifest itself in 'interconnected and complex ways', including the development of 'addictions after using alcohol or other drugs to manage the psychological trauma of abuse, which in turn affected their physical and mental health, sometimes leading to criminal behaviour and relationship difficulties.'<sup>20</sup> A number of survivors who appeared before the royal commission had described how the impact of child sexual abuse had contributed to criminal behaviour as adolescents and adults.<sup>21</sup> This information raises concerns as to whether there is a reasoned and evidence-based explanation of how the proposed exclusion addresses a substantial and pressing concern, and whether any such exclusion is proportionate.

2.137 However, the minister further explained the discretion to determine eligibility for redress of survivors, including survivors who have criminal convictions:

However, the Scheme Operator will have discretion at subsections 16(2) and (3) of the Commonwealth Bill to determine the eligibility of survivors applying for redress on a case-by-case basis, including survivors who are currently, or have been, incarcerated. Importantly, the Scheme Operator can use this discretion to deem a person eligible for redress if they are otherwise ineligible due to the criminal convictions exclusions. In considering whether to exercise discretion, the Scheme Operator will consider the nature of the crime committed, the duration of the sentence and broader public interest issues. The Scheme Operator discretion is also intended to mitigate the impact of jurisdictional differences in crimes legislation. For example, mandatory minimum sentences for certain offences may lead to some applicants receiving longer sentences than they would in other jurisdictions, and perhaps making them ineligible for the Scheme.

2.138 The minister also explained that 'all aspects of the Scheme have been subject to ongoing consultation' and that any legislative changes, including creating or amending legislative instruments, would be undertaken in consultation and agreement of a proposed Board of Governance established to advise on the scheme. The ability of the scheme operator to exercise discretion in the way proposed by the minister may address some of the concerns in relation to the compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy, insofar as it places limits on how the broad power may be exercised and may ensure that survivors are eligible for the scheme. The committee will assess the human rights compatibility of any proposed rules or provisions in the proposed national bill that excludes persons convicted of certain offences once it is introduced.

Committee response

2.139 The committee thanks the minister for his response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.140 Noting the broad scope of the proposed power to determine eligibility or ineligibility in the national redress scheme rules, there may be concerns as to the compatibility of this measure with the right to an effective remedy. In particular, there are concerns in relation to the proposed exclusion of persons with certain criminal convictions from being eligible for the scheme. However, the discretion of the scheme operator to determine eligibility of survivors if they are otherwise ineligible may be capable of addressing some of these concerns. If the bill is passed, the committee will consider the human rights implications of any legislative instrument or proposed National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Bill when it is received or introduced.

2.141 The committee notes the minister's intention to include any limitation on eligibility for persons with criminal convictions in the primary legislation of the proposed National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Bill.

Power to determine when a participating institution is not responsible for sexual or non-sexual abuse

2.142 Proposed section 21 of the bill sets out when a participating institution is responsible for abuse. Subsection 21(7) provides that a participating institution is not responsible for sexual or non-sexual abuse of a person if it occurs in circumstances prescribed by the rules as being circumstances in which a participating institution is not, or should not be treated as being, responsible for the abuse of a person.

Compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy for breaches of human rights

2.143 The statement of compatibility does not acknowledge that the right to an effective remedy is engaged by the power to determine by way of rules when a participating institution is not responsible for sexual or non-sexual abuse. However, as noted earlier, broad rule-making powers conferred on the executive may be incompatible with the right to an effective remedy where those powers are exercised in a manner that is incompatible with the right. Further, where public officials or state agents have committed violations of human rights, states parties concerned may not relieve perpetrators from personal responsibility through the granting of amnesties, legal immunities and indemnities.<sup>22</sup>

2.144 The explanatory memorandum provides that proposed subsection 21(7) is intended to ensure that institutions are not found responsible for abuse that occurred in circumstances where it would be unreasonable to hold the institution responsible. The explanatory memorandum states by way of example that such circumstances may include where child sexual abuse was perpetrated by another child and the institution could not have foreseen this abuse occurring and could not be considered to have mismanaged the situation.<sup>23</sup>

2.145 As limited information has been provided in the statement of compatibility on this point, the initial analysis stated that it is not possible to determine the extent to which the right to an effective remedy may be engaged and limited by this aspect of the bill. The committee therefore sought the advice of the minister as to the compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy.

Minister's response

2.146 The minister's response provides the following information in relation to the committee's inquiries:

As the Committee has noted, subclause 21(7) of the Commonwealth Bill is intended to operate to ensure that participating institutions are not found responsible for abuse that occurred in circumstances where it would be unreasonable to hold the institution responsible.

The power in subclause 21(7) will also be used to clarify circumstances where a participating government institution should not be considered responsible. Such circumstances may include:

- where the government only had a regulatory role over a non-government institution;
- where the government only provided funding to a non-government institution; and
- where the only connection is that the non-government institution was established under law enacted by the government.

Until institutions opt in to the Scheme, it is not possible to envisage every possible circumstance to include in the legislation. These rulemaking provisions allow the Scheme to be responsive to the realities of implementation, which is necessary to achieve the legitimate aim of public and institutional support for the Scheme. Were the Scheme too fixed in its methodology, the Scheme may face criticism for reaching unreasonable decisions.

2.147 Providing for a national redress scheme that is responsive to issues that arise in relation to the scheme's implementation is likely to be a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law, and providing a rule-making power to address such issues is likely to be rationally connected to this objective. As noted in the initial analysis, the concerns arise in relation to how the rule-making power may be exercised. Were the power to be exercised in a manner that was to relieve perpetrators from personal responsibility, this may be incompatible with the right to an effective remedy. However, the examples provided by the minister in his response indicate that the rule-making power may be exercised where a participating institution's role was minimal. If the bill is passed, the committee will consider the human rights implications of the instrument once it is received.

Committee response

2.148 The committee thanks the minister for his response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.149 Noting the broad scope of the proposed power to determine by way of rules when a participating institution is not responsible for sexual or non-sexual abuse, there may be human rights concerns in relation to its operation. This is because its scope is such that it could be used in ways that may risk being incompatible with the right to an effective remedy. If the bill is passed, the committee will consider the human rights implications of any redress scheme rules once they are received.

Bar on future civil liability of participating institutions

2.150 Proposed sections 39 and 40 of the bill provide that where an eligible person receives an offer of redress and chooses to accept that offer, the person releases and forever discharges all institutions participating in the scheme from all civil liability for abuse of the person that is within the scope of the scheme, and the eligible person cannot (whether as an individual, a representative party or a member of a group) bring or continue any civil claim against those participating institutions in relation to that abuse.

Compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy for breaches of human rights

2.151 As noted earlier, the right to an effective remedy requires State parties to the ICCPR to establish appropriate judicial and administrative mechanisms for addressing claims of human rights violations, and further requires that State parties may not relieve perpetrators from personal responsibility for breaches of human rights.

2.152 Insofar as the bill requires persons who accept an offer of redress under the scheme to relinquish their right to seek further civil remedies from responsible institutions for sexual abuse and related non-sexual abuse, the bill may engage the right to an effective remedy. The statement of compatibility acknowledges that the right to an effective remedy may be engaged and limited by this aspect of the bill, but considers that any limitation is reasonable, necessary and proportionate to ensuring the scheme's integrity and proper functioning.<sup>24</sup> In particular, the statement of compatibility explains:

Due to its non-legalistic nature, redress through the Scheme will be a more accessible remedy for eligible survivors than civil litigation. Entitlement to redress is determined based on a standard of 'reasonable likelihood', which is lower than the standard for determining the outcome of civil litigation, which is the balance of probabilities. The availability of redress is dependent on the extent to which Territory government and non-government institutions opt-in to the Scheme. Consultation has shown that institutions are not likely to opt-in to the Scheme if they remained exposed to paying compensation through civil litigation in addition to paying monetary redress. Attaching the release to entitlement to all elements of redress is necessary to encourage institutions to opt-in and to make redress available to the maximum number of survivors.<sup>25</sup>

2.153 However, relinquishing a person's opportunity to pursue civil litigation and possible common law damages is a significant decision for a victim of abuse to make, particularly as the amount to be provided under the redress scheme is capped at $150,000.<sup>26</sup> The minister explains that, in order to acknowledge the limitation on the right to an effective remedy that arises from this aspect of the bill:

...the Scheme will deliver free, trauma informed, culturally appropriate and expert Legal Support Services. These services will be available to survivors for the lifetime of the Scheme at relevant points of the application process, and will assist survivors to understand the implications of releasing responsible institutions from further liability. This means that survivors will be able to make an informed choice as to whether they wish to accept their offer and in doing so release the institution from civil liability for abuse within the scope of the Scheme or seek remedy through other avenues.<sup>27</sup>

2.154 Notwithstanding the description of the proposed legal support services described in the statement of compatibility, the bill itself includes limited detail as to the provision of legal advice to survivors of sexual abuse. Proposed section 37(1)(g)

of the bill requires that a written offer of redress to an eligible person 'gives information about the opportunity for the person to access legal services under the scheme for the purposes of obtaining legal advice about whether to accept the offer'. The provision of legal services under the scheme is to be determined by legislative instrument.<sup>28</sup> The initial analysis stated that further information as to the content of the proposed rules relating to the provision of legal services would assist in determining whether this will serve as a sufficient safeguard so as to support the measure constituting an effective remedy.<sup>29</sup>

2.155 The committee therefore sought the advice of the minister as to the compatibility of the measure with the right to an effective remedy, in particular the content of the proposed rules relating to the provision of legal services under the scheme.

Minister's response

2.156 In response, the minister provided the following information:

The measure is supported by proportionate and essential safeguards for survivors through the provision of a free community-based legal service to ensure survivors understand the legal implications of signing a release. The free community-based legal service will be available to survivors at the commencement of their engagement with the Scheme. The website, helpline and other engagement documents will make it clear to survivors that a release will be required in order to receive redress under the Scheme. The Scheme will make available legal advice during this process so that survivors understand the legal implications.

The Rules will include a provision which provides funding for legal services for the purposes of a person receiving trauma informed, culturally appropriate and expert legal advice as required throughout the Scheme.

Legal services will be available during the four key stages of the redress application process:

1. prior to application so survivors understand eligibility requirements and the application process of the Scheme;
2. during completion of a survivor's application;
3. after a survivor has received an offer of redress (including if they elect to seek an internal review); and

28 See proposed section 117(2)(a) of the bill.

29 It is noted that the recommendation as to the provision of legal services of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse was that 'a redress scheme should fund, at a fixed price, a legal consultation for an applicant before the applicant decides whether or not to accept the offer of redress and grant the required releases': Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, Redress and Civil Litigation Report (2015) Recommendation 64, 390

4. on the effect of signing a Deed of Release (DoR), including its impact on the prospect of future litigation.

Survivors will be able to obtain free legal assistance on an ongoing basis as required across each of the above four stages.

The Rules will also include a provision that allows a person who cannot access the funded legal service because of a conflict of interest, to be referred to another legal firm and have their legal costs covered by the Scheme's legal services provider.

In relation to the release, legal support could include:

- providing an explanation of the factors which make up the offer survivors have received and the matters considered by the assessment team;
- identifying the potential rights that the survivor is releasing; and
- helping the survivor decide whether they wish to accept the offer or not.

2.157 This information provides useful further information as to the content of the proposed rules relating to the provision of legal services. However, whether the safeguards are sufficient so as to be compatible with the right to an effective remedy will depend on the precise wording of the rules, and therefore the committee will consider the human rights compatibility of the rules when the instrument is received.

Committee response

2.158 The committee thanks the minister for his response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.159 The bar on future civil liability of participating institutions may engage and limit the right to an effective remedy. However, the proposed rules governing the provision of legal services under the redress scheme may operate as a sufficient safeguard so as to support the human rights compatibility of the measure. The committee will consider the compatibility of the proposed rules governing the provision of legal services, and whether they offer adequate safeguards, when they are received.

Information Sharing Provisions

2.160 Proposed section 77 of the bill sets out the circumstances in which the Commonwealth Redress Scheme Operator<sup>30</sup> (the Operator) may disclose protected information. 'Protected information' is defined in proposed section 75 of the bill as

30 The Commonwealth Redress Scheme Operator is the Secretary to the Human Services Department (or the Department administered by the Minister administering the Human Services (Centrelink) Act 1997), and is responsible for operating the scheme, including making offers of redress to the person.

information about a person obtained by an officer for the purposes of the scheme that is or was held by the department. The Operator can disclose such protected information if it was acquired by an officer in the performance of their duties or in the exercise of their powers under the bill if the Operator certifies that the disclosure is necessary in the public interest in a particular case or class of case, and the disclosure is to such persons and for such purposes as the Operator determines.<sup>31</sup> Disclosure may also be made by the Operator to certain persons set out in the bill, including the secretary of a department, the chief executive of Centrelink and the chief executive of Medicare.<sup>32</sup>

2.161 The right to privacy includes respect for informational privacy, including the right to respect for private and confidential information, particularly the storing, use and sharing of such information; and the right to control the dissemination of information about one's private life.

2.162 The information sharing powers of the Operator in proposed section 77 of the bill engage and limit the right to privacy by providing for the disclosure of protected information. As acknowledged in the statement of compatibility, this protected information may include highly sensitive information about child sexual abuse the person has experienced.<sup>33</sup>

2.163 The right to privacy may be subject to permissible limitations which are provided by law and are not arbitrary. In order for limitations not to be arbitrary, the measure must pursue a legitimate objective and be rationally connected and proportionate to achieving that objective.

2.164 As outlined in the initial analysis, the statement of compatibility acknowledges that the right to privacy is engaged by the information sharing provisions in the bill, which includes proposed section 77. However, the statement of compatibility explains any limitation by the information sharing provisions on the right to privacy is permissible, as the provisions are 'necessary to achieve the legitimate aims of assessing eligibility under the Scheme and protecting children from abuse, and are appropriately limited to ensure that they are a proportionate means to achieve those aims'.<sup>34</sup> using and disclosing this information to relevant bodies so as to prevent abuse and provide redress is likely to be rationally connected to this objective.

2.166 As to the proportionality of the measure, limitations on the right to privacy must be no more extensive than what is strictly necessary to achieve the legitimate objective of the measure. The statement of compatibility explains the broad rationale for allowing persons to obtain and disclose protected information for the purposes of the scheme as follows:

To establish eligibility, survivors will be required to supply the Scheme with personal information including highly sensitive information about the child sexual abuse they experienced. To progress the application to assessment, limited survivor and alleged perpetrator details will be provided, with the survivor's consent, to the participating institutions identified in their application. Participating institutions will be able to use this information in a limited way to facilitate making insurance claims and to institute internal disciplinary procedures where an alleged perpetrator or person with knowledge of abuse is still associated with the institution. Participating institutions will be required to provide the Scheme with specific information pertaining to survivors and alleged perpetrators, including survivor and the alleged perpetrator's involvement with the institution, any related complaints of abuse made to the institution and details of any prior payments made to the survivor. This collection and exchange of information is necessary for the eligibility assessment process and information under the Scheme will be subject to confidentiality. Outside of Scheme representatives, only survivors and those they nominate will have access to records relating to their application. Strict offence provisions will be put in place to mitigate risks of unlawful access, disclosure, recording, use, soliciting or offering to supply Scheme information.<sup>35</sup>

2.167 However, the statement of compatibility does not appear to address the proportionality of the bill insofar as it relates to the Operator's disclosure powers in proposed section 77. The power in proposed section 77 for the Operator to disclose information is very broad: the Operator can disclose protected information to 'such persons and for such purposes as the Operator determines', provided the Operator considers it necessary in the public interest to do so.<sup>36</sup> It is not clear from the statement of compatibility whether it is strictly necessary to include such a broad category of persons to whom disclosure may be made by the Operator, and what circumstances will constitute a 'public interest', which raises concerns that these information sharing provisions may not be sufficiently circumscribed.

36 Proposed section 77(1(a) of the bill.

2.168 Another relevant factor in assessing proportionality is whether there are adequate safeguards in place to protect the right to privacy. It was noted that there are penalties in place for persons who engage in unauthorised recording, disclosure or use of protected information.<sup>37</sup> However, the powers of the Operator to disclose information in the public interest in proposed section 77 do not appear to be accompanied by safeguards present in other information sharing provisions in the bill, such as a requirement that the Operator consider the impact disclosure may have on a person to whom the information relates. By way of contrast, it was noted that there is a separate provision in section 78 of the bill addressing disclosure of protected information to certain agencies (such as the Australian Federal Police or state and territory police forces) for the purposes of law enforcement or child protection, where there is a safeguard in place that requires the Operator to have regard to the impact the disclosure might have on the person,<sup>38</sup> as well as a requirement that the Operator is satisfied that disclosure of the information is reasonably necessary for the enforcement of the criminal law or for the purposes of child protection.<sup>39</sup> Further, the initial analysis stated that disclosure for other purposes such as for the purpose of the participating institution facilitating a claim under an insurance policy must only occur if there has been consideration to the impact that disclosure might have on the person who has applied for redress.<sup>40</sup> It is not clear from the statement of compatibility why such safeguards are available in relation to some information sharing provisions in the bill, but not in relation to the Operator's disclosure powers in proposed section 77.

2.169 The committee therefore sought the advice of the minister as to whether the limitation on the right to privacy is proportionate to the stated objective of the measure (including whether there are adequate safeguards in place in relation to disclosure by the Operator of protected information).

Minister's response

2.170 The minister's response provides the following information in relation to the committee's inquiries:

Section 77 of the Commonwealth Bill has been drafted to reflect similar provisions in other legislation within the Social Services portfolio, which routinely deals with a person's sensitive information and provides a consistent approach to the way in which the Department deals with protected information. It was considered appropriate to provide a power to enable rules to be made by the Minister if it was considered necessary to assist with the exercise of the Scheme Operator's disclosure of protected information. This provides flexibility to address any circumstances that arise which are of sufficient public interest to warrant the exercise of that power. Incorporating high-level rules in the Commonwealth Bill would restrict the Scheme Operator's power to make a public interest disclosure to those circumstances set out in the Commonwealth Bill.

Careful consideration will be given to ensure that any personal information held by the Scheme Operator is given due and proper protection. It is envisaged the power to make public interest disclosures will only be used where it is necessary to prevent, or lessen, a threat to life, health or welfare, for the purpose of briefing the Minister or if the information is necessary to assist a court, coronial inquiry, Royal Commission, or similar, for specific purposes such as a reported missing person or a homeless person. These criteria are some of those that are already outlined in other legislation in the Social Services portfolio that govern public interest certificates, such as the Social Security (Public Interest Certificate Guidelines) (DSS) Determination 2015 and the Paid Parental Leave Rules 2010.

Despite there not being a positive requirement in the Commonwealth Bill, the intention is to make rules to regulate the Scheme Operator's disclosure power to ensure that the limitation on the right to privacy is proportionate to achieve the various legitimate aims of public interest disclosures. However, the Committee's concerns are noted and I will consider including a positive requirement for rules in the National Bill, including a requirement that the Scheme Operator must have regard to the impact the disclosure may have on a person to whom the information relates.

2.171 The minister's response provides useful information as to the scope of the Operator's power to make public interest disclosures. In particular, the minister's explanation that the power is proposed to be exercised in similar circumstances to those outlined in other instruments that govern public interest certificates such as the Social Security (Public Interest Certificate Guidelines) (DSS) Determination 2015, suggests any disclosure of personal information would be exceptional.<sup>41</sup> Disclosure in the circumstances outlined by the minister (namely, where it is necessary to prevent, or lessen, a threat to life, health or welfare, for the purpose of briefing the Minister or if the information is necessary to assist a court, coronial inquiry, Royal Commission, or similar, for specific purposes such as a reported missing person or a homeless person) would likely be sufficiently circumscribed so as to constitute a proportionate limitation on the right to privacy.

41 The committee has previously considered that the Social Security (Public Interest Certificate Guidelines) (DSS) Determination 2015 is compatible with the right to privacy: see Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Thirtieth Report of the 44th Parliament (10 November 2015) p. 140 and pp. 146-147.

2.172 It is also noted that the minister intends to make rules regulating the Scheme Operator's disclosure power and is also considering including a positive requirement for rules in any proposed national bill, as well as a safeguard by requiring the Scheme Operator to have regard to the impact disclosure may have on a person to whom the information relates. Such matters would likely address the concerns outlined in the initial analysis as to the scope of the power and the sufficiency of safeguards.

Committee response

2.173 The committee thanks the minister for his response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.174 The further information provided by the minister indicates that the power to make public interest disclosures will only be used where it is necessary to prevent, or lessen, a threat to life, health or welfare, for the purpose of briefing the minister or if the information is necessary to assist a court, coronial inquiry, Royal Commission, or similar, for specific purposes such as a reported missing person or a homeless person. The committee notes that disclosure in such circumstances may be sufficiently circumscribed such that the measure would be a proportionate limitation on the right to privacy. The committee recommends that the Scheme Operator's disclosure power be monitored by government to ensure that any limitation on the right to privacy be no more extensive than what is strictly necessary.

2.175 The committee will consider the human rights compatibility of the proposed rules to regulate the Scheme Operator's disclosure power when they are received.

2.176 The committee notes that the minister has indicated he will consider including a positive requirement that the Scheme Operator must have regard to the impact the disclosure may have on a person to whom the information relates in any future legislation developed to reflect a national redress scheme, and will also consider including a positive requirement for rules to regulate the Scheme Operator's disclosure power.

Absence of external merits review and removal of judicial review

2.177 The bill establishes a system of internal review of determinations made under the scheme.<sup>42</sup> No provision is provided in the bill for determinations to be able to be subject to external merits review. Pursuant to the internal review procedure, a person may apply to the Operator to review a determination made in relation to redress and the Operator must cause that determination to be reviewed by an independent decision-maker to whom the Operator's power under this section is delegated, and who was not involved in the making of the determination.<sup>43</sup> A person reviewing the original determination must reconsider the determination and either affirm, vary, or set aside the determination and make a new determination.<sup>44</sup> When reviewing the original determination, the person may only have regard to the information and documents that were available to the person who made the original determination.<sup>45</sup>

2.178 The Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse (Consequential Amendments) Bill 2017 (the consequential amendments bill) exempts decisions made under the scheme from judicial review under the Administrative Decisions (Judicial Review) Act 1977 (ADJR Act).<sup>46</sup>

Compatibility of the measure with the right to a fair hearing

2.179 Article 14(1) of the ICCPR requires that in the determination of a person's rights and obligations in a suit at law, everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law. A determination of a person's entitlement to redress as a result of sexual abuse, and a finding of responsibility on the part of institutions for such abuse, involves the determination of rights and obligations and therefore is likely to constitute a suit at law.<sup>47</sup>

2.180 The initial analysis stated that the absence of external merits review and the removal of a form of judicial review may engage and limit the right to a fair hearing, as it limits survivors' opportunities to have their rights and obligations determined by an independent and impartial tribunal. However, the statement of compatibility does not acknowledge that the right to a fair hearing is engaged by the measures.

2.181 A limitation on the right to a fair hearing may be permissible if it pursues a legitimate objective, is rationally connected to that legitimate objective and is a proportionate means of achieving that objective.

2.182 The explanatory memorandum to the consequential amendments bill explains the rationale for limiting the scheme to internal review and the removal of judicial review. In particular, the explanatory memorandum explains that judicial review may cause undue administrative delays under the scheme, and the internal review mechanism is intended to prevent re-traumatising victims through having to re-tell their story of past institutional child sexual abuse.

2.183 Preventing re-traumatisation of victims of sexual abuse is likely to be a legitimate objective under international human rights law. However, in circumstances where the victim themselves may choose to pursue external review (by way of merits review or judicial review) if they are unsatisfied with the decision, it is not clear based on the information provided that preventing victims from pursuing external review if dissatisfied with the internal decision would be an effective means of achieving this objective.

2.184 Further, the explanatory memorandum explains that, when internally reviewing the decision, the Operator or independent decision-makers are not permitted to have been involved in making the original decision under review. However, it was unclear whether the internal review mechanism provides greater or lesser scope for independent and impartial review than that which would be provided by the (external) Administrative Appeals Tribunal. It was not clear, therefore, whether the internal review mechanism is an effective substitute for external review.

2.185 The committee therefore sought the advice of the minister as to the compatibility of the measure with the right to a fair hearing, including:

- whether the absence of external merits review and removal of judicial review pursues a legitimate objective;
- whether the measures are rationally connected to (that is, effective to achieve) that objective; and
- whether the measures are a proportionate means of achieving the stated objective.

Minister's response

2.186 The minister's response provides the following information on the internal review mechanism:

The decision to exclude external merits review for applicants was made on the advice of the Independent Advisory Council on Redress and following the Royal Commission's recommendation on this matter. The Council recommended the Scheme provide survivors with access to an internal review process, but no access to external merits or judicial review as it considered that providing survivors with external review would be overly legalistic, time consuming, expensive and would risk further harm to survivors. If judicial review avenues were available, many survivors may have unrealistic expectations of what could be achieved given the low evidentiary barrier to entry to the Scheme compared to civil litigation, and that therefore the judicial review process is likely to re-traumatise a survivor.

The Department of Social Services will recruit appropriately qualified, independent assessors, known as Independent Decision Makers, who will make all decisions on applications made to the Scheme. Independent Decision Makers will not report or be answerable to Government. These Independent Decision Makers will be able to provide survivors with access to independent and impartial review without subjecting them to potential re-traumatisation.

Members of the Administrative Appeals Tribunal are appointed based on their judicial experience, not recruited for the skillset and understanding of the survivor cohort that will be required of Independent Decision Makers. The Administrative Appeals Tribunal must make a legally correct or preferable decision, while Independent Decision Makers will make decisions on applications with highly variable levels of detail and without strict legislative guidance on what weight should be applied to the information they do receive. Without an understanding of past decisions under the Scheme, the Tribunal may reach decisions that are inconsistent with past decisions made by Independent Decision Makers. Utilising the Administrative Appeals Tribunal for merits review under the Scheme risks inappropriately imposing a legalistic lens on a non-legalistic decision making process.

2.187 The minister's response provides useful information as to the rationale for excluding external merits review and the proposed operation of the internal review scheme with Independent Decision Makers. Having regard to this information and the particular context in which the review scheme operates, the internal review mechanism may be capable of ensuring that survivors have adequate opportunities to have their rights and obligations determined in a manner that is compatible with the right to a fair hearing. It is also noted that the consequential amendments bill, which removes judicial review under the ADJR Act, does not appear to preclude judicial review under section 75(v) of the Constitution and section 39B of the Judiciary Act 1903. However, noting that it is difficult to determine how, and the extent to which, the internal review mechanism may impact on the right to a fair hearing until it is in operation, it is recommended that the mechanism be monitored to ensure that the review mechanism operates in such a way as to ensure that survivors have sufficient opportunities to have their rights and obligations determined by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Committee response

2.188 The committee thanks the minister for his response and has concluded its examination of this issue.

2.189 Having regard to this information and the particular context in which the review scheme operates, the internal review mechanism may be capable of ensuring that survivors have adequate opportunities to have their rights and obligations determined in a manner that is compatible with the right to a fair hearing. However, the committee recommends that the operation of the internal review mechanism be monitored to ensure that survivors have sufficient opportunities to have their rights and obligations determined by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Background

2.190 The committee first reported on the Fair Work Laws Amendment (Proper Use of Worker Benefits) Bill 2017 (the bill) in its Report 12 of 2017, and requested a response from the Minister for Employment by 13 December 2017.<sup>1</sup>

2.191 The minister's response to the committee's inquiries was received on 19 December 2017 and discussed in Report 1 of 2018.<sup>2</sup>

1 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Report 12 of 2017 (28 November 2017) pp. 16-24.

2.192 The committee requested a second response from the minister by 8 February 2018, specifically in relation to prohibiting terms of industrial agreements requiring or permitting payments to worker entitlement funds and the right to collectively bargain. The committee also welcomed any additional comments in relation to any other matter relevant to its consideration of the bill. A response from the Minister for Small and Family Business, the Workplace and Deregulation was received on 8 February 2018. The response is discussed below and is reproduced in full at Appendix 3. The response addressed the committee's specific request and did not provide further comments more generally in relation to the bill.

Prohibiting terms of industrial agreements requiring or permitting payments to worker entitlement funds

2.193 Schedule 2 of the bill would amend the Fair Work Act 2009 (Fair Work Act) to prohibit any term of a modern award or an enterprise agreement requiring or permitting contributions for the benefit of an employee to be made to any fund other than a superannuation fund, a registered worker entitlement fund or a registered charity.<sup>3</sup>

Compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of association and the right to just and favourable conditions at work

2.194 The right to freedom of association includes the right to collectively bargain without unreasonable and disproportionate interference from the state. The right to just and favourable conditions of work includes the right to safe working conditions. These rights are protected by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR).<sup>4</sup>

2.195 The interpretation of these rights is informed by International Labour Organization (ILO) treaties, including the ILO Convention of 1948 concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise (ILO Convention No. 87) and the ILO Convention of 1949 concerning the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining (ILO Convention No. 98), which protects the right of employees to collectively bargain for terms and conditions of employment.<sup>5</sup> The principle of 'autonomy of bargaining' in the negotiation of collective agreements is an 'essential element' of Article 4 of ILO Convention No. 98 which envisages that parties will be free to reach their own settlement of a collective agreement without interference.<sup>6</sup>

2.196 Prohibiting the inclusion of particular terms in an enterprise agreement interferes with the outcomes of the bargaining process. Accordingly, the initial human rights analysis stated that the measure engages and may limit the right to just and favourable conditions of work and the right to collectively bargain as an aspect of the right to freedom of association.

2.197 Measures limiting the right to freedom of association including the right to collectively bargain may be permissible providing certain criteria are satisfied. Generally, to be capable of justifying a limit on human rights, the measure must address a legitimate objective, be rationally connected to that objective and be a proportionate way to achieve that objective.<sup>7</sup> Further, Article 22(3) of the ICCPR and article 8 of the ICESCR expressly provide that no limitations are permissible on this right if they are inconsistent with the guarantees of freedom of association and the right to collectively organise contained in the ILO Convention No. 87.

2.198 The ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA Committee), which is a supervisory mechanism that examines complaints about violations of the right to freedom of association and the right to collectively bargain, has stated that 'measures taken unilaterally by the authorities to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are often incompatible with Convention No. 98'.<sup>8</sup> The CFA Committee has noted that there are some circumstances in which it might be legitimate for a government to limit the outcomes of a bargaining process, stating that 'any limitation on collective bargaining on the part of the authorities should be preceded by consultations with the workers' and employers' organizations in an effort to obtain their agreement'.<sup>9</sup>

2.199 Indeed, international supervisory mechanisms have previously raised specific concerns in relation to current restrictions imposed on bargaining outcomes under Australian domestic law.<sup>10</sup> In relation to restrictions on the scope of collective bargaining and bargaining outcomes, CFA Committee noted that:

...the right to bargain freely with employers with respect to conditions of work constitutes an essential element in freedom of association, and trade unions should have the right, through collective bargaining or other lawful means, to seek to improve the living and working conditions of those whom the trade unions represent. The public authorities should refrain from any interference, which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof. Any such interference would appear to infringe the principle that workers' and employers' organizations should have the right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes.<sup>11</sup>

2.200 In this respect the statement of compatibility acknowledges that the measure engages the right to freedom of association, the right to voluntarily reach bargaining outcomes, and the right to just and favourable conditions at work. However, the statement of compatibility asserts that the limitation on these rights is permissible. It states that the measure pursues the legitimate objectives of addressing 'the potential for misappropriation of funds and [to] avoid conflicts of interest and possible coercion'.<sup>12</sup> It points to the Final Report of the Royal Commission into Trade Union Governance and Corruption (Heydon Royal Commission) in support of this objective.<sup>13</sup> While the stated objectives may be capable of constituting a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law, the initial analysis noted that it would have been useful if the statement of compatibility had more fully explained how any findings from the Heydon Royal Commission supported the importance of this objective as a substantial or pressing concern.

2.201 The statement of compatibility provides some information as to whether the measure is rationally connected to (that is, effective to achieve) its stated objectives. It notes that the measure does not prohibit contributions to worker entitlement funds but requires any contributions 'to be made to registered worker entitlement funds that are subject to basic governance and disclosure requirements designed to address potential conflicts of interest, breaches of fiduciary duty and the potential for coercion'.<sup>14</sup> As such the measure would appear to be rationally connected to its stated objective.

2.202 However, the statement of compatibility provides limited information as to whether the limitation is proportionate. In order to be a proportionate limitation on human rights a measure must be the least rights restrictive way of achieving its stated objective.

2.203 Accordingly, the committee sought the advice of the Minister for Employment as to:

- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve that objective (including findings by relevant international supervisory mechanisms about whether the limitation is permissible); and
- whether consultation has occurred with the relevant workers' and employers' organisations in relation to the measure.

Minister's first response

2.204 The minister's first response described the current restrictions on bargaining outcomes imposed by the Fair Work Act and restates the scope of the new restrictions. The minister's response noted that the committee's initial report stated that the limitation imposed by the measure appeared to be rationally connected to its stated objective.

2.205 In relation to whether the limitation is reasonable and proportionate to achieve the stated objective, the minister's response stated:

Any worker entitlement fund, including those controlled by any industrial association, can be registered provided it meets basic governance and disclosure requirements. These requirements are designed to address potential conflicts of interest, breaches of fiduciary duty and coercive conduct. There is no restriction on who can be a member of a fund. The provisions enhance the right to just and favourable conditions of work by ensuring that money held by worker entitlement funds is used to benefit workers. The amendments will provide employees with a guarantee that any contributions they voluntarily make to a worker entitlement fund is subject to appropriate scrutiny and oversight.

To the extent that the prohibition may engage any of these rights, the measure is reasonable and proportionate and enhances workers' rights by ensuring that money held on their behalf is protected. The amendments are the least rights restrictive possible in that they do not represent an unqualified prohibition on terms of industrial agreements that provide for contributions to worker entitlement funds. Rather, they require such contributions to be made to registered worker entitlement funds that are subject to basic governance and disclosure obligations.

The International Labour Organization (ILO) has stated that 'Restrictions on [the] principle [of leaving the greatest possible autonomy to organizations in their functioning and administration] should have the sole objective of protecting the interests of members'.

To the extent the proposed provisions may engage with these rights they do so only to protect the rights of workers by ensuring that their money is properly managed and their interests protected.

The provisions support the basic governance and disclosure requirements of the Bill that are designed to address potential conflicts of interest, breaches of fiduciary duty and potential for coercive conduct that were found by the Royal Commission into Trade Union Governance and Corruption (Royal Commission) in examining the operation in Australia of worker entitlement funds. As such, the amendment protects the interests of workers.

2.206 The minister's response provided a range of information about the scope of the limitation on bargaining outcomes. In this respect, it is relevant to the proportionality of the measure that it will still be possible to negotiate clauses in enterprise agreements which require or permit payments to be made to registered workers' entitlement funds, superannuation funds or charities. However, prohibiting any term of an enterprise agreement that otherwise requires or permits contributions for the benefit of an employee may still have significant effects on voluntarily negotiated outcomes.

2.207 As discussed further below, there are a range of restrictions on registered worker entitlement funds and who can operate them. Under the proposed bill, registered organisations including unions are prohibited from operating registered workers' entitlement funds and there are restrictions on how funds can be spent. This means that, for example, even if an employer and employees agreed through an enterprise agreement to set up an occupational health and safety training fund to be administered and run by the relevant union, this would not be permissible. It was unclear from the minister's response how prohibiting this kind of voluntarily negotiated clause in general is the least rights restrictive approach to achieving the stated objective. Further, while the minister's response referred to ILO comments about when it may be legitimate to limit particular rights, it did not address the specific concerns raised by international monitoring bodies in relation to Australia's restrictions on bargaining outcomes through prohibiting particular matters in enterprise agreements (discussed at [2.199] above). In light of the concerns raised by these international monitoring bodies as to the existing restrictions on bargaining outcomes in Australia, it is likely that any amendments which further restrict such matters would also raise concerns.

2.208 Finally, the minister's response outlined consultation which occurred with worker entitlement funds and employee and employer organisations prior to introduction. Consultation processes are relevant to an assessment of the measure, and may assist in determining whether a limitation is the least rights restrictive means of pursuing a legitimate objective on the available evidence. However, the fact of consultation alone is not sufficient to address the human rights concerns in relation to the measure.

2.209 The committee considered that, in the absence of additional information addressing these concerns, prohibiting terms of industrial agreements that require or permit payments to worker entitlement funds is likely to be incompatible with the right to collectively bargain.

2.210 The committee therefore sought further advice from the minister in relation to the compatibility of the measure with the right to collectively bargain, in particular any information in light of findings by relevant international supervisory mechanisms.

Minister's second response

2.211 The Minister for Small and Family Business, the Workplace and Deregulation provided the following information in relation to the committee's inquiries:

A detailed response to issues raised in Human Rights Scrutiny Report No. 12 of 2017 in relation to the Bill was provided to the Committee by the office of Senator the Hon Michaelia Cash, then Minister for Employment, on 19 December 2017. That response addressed the proposed prohibition on industrial instruments requiring or permitting payments to unregistered worker entitlement funds, noting that while the prohibition engages the right to collectively bargain, it does so in a manner that is reasonable and proportionate and enhances workers' rights.

The Bill prohibits terms in industrial agreements that require or permit payments only to unregistered worker entitlement funds. Registered worker entitlement funds will be required to comply with basic governance and disclosure requirements. The prohibition on payments to unregistered worker entitlement funds is simply a mechanism to ensure that such funds are properly regulated, subject to appropriate minimum governance requirements and comply with laws similar to those that apply to other managed investment schemes.

Findings from two Royal Commissions have emphasised the importance of properly regulating worker entitlement funds, particularly given the significant sums of money held by these funds for the benefit of workers, and the consequences that would follow if a fund was to fail.

Most recently, the 2016 report of the Royal Commission into Trade Union Governance and Corruption (2016 Royal Commission) recommended that legislation be enacted dealing comprehensively with the minimum governance, financial reporting and financial disclosures for worker entitlement funds. This Bill implements that recommendation.

As noted in the previous response of 19 December 2017, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) has stated that 'Restrictions on [the] principle [of leaving the greatest possible autonomy to organizations in their functioning and administration] should have the sole objective of protecting the interests of members'. It is considered that the 'functioning' of organisations includes their ability to collectively bargain, such that any restriction on collective bargaining should have the sole objective of protecting the interests of members.

A prohibition on industrial instruments requiring or permitting payments to unregistered worker entitlement funds is intended to protect the interests of members of organisations by ensuring that such payments may only be made to worker entitlement funds that are registered. A worker entitlement fund can be registered provided it meets basic governance and disclosure requirements. These requirements are designed to address potential conflicts of interest, breaches of fiduciary duty and coercive conduct. The provisions in the Bill ensure that money held by worker entitlement funds is used to benefit workers. The amendments will provide members with a guarantee that any contributions made to a worker entitlement fund is subject to appropriate scrutiny and oversight.

In addition, the ILO considers that there are some exceptions to the general rule that measures taken to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are generally considered to be incompatible with international labour standards. These include 'the prohibition of certain subjects for reasons of public order'. Further, Article 4 of the ILO Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention 1949 (No. 98) specifies that the machinery for voluntary negotiation of terms and conditions of employment should be 'appropriate to national conditions'.

Given that the prohibition supports the basic governance and disclosure requirements of the Bill that are intended to address potential conflicts of interest, breaches of fiduciary duty and potential for coercive conduct outlined in the 2016 Royal Commission, in addition to protecting the interests of workers and supporting public order, it is appropriate to Australian conditions and so is permissible.

2.212 The minister's second response provides a range of further information to address the committee's inquiry. The information provided further demonstrates that the stated objective of protecting the rights and interests of members is likely to constitute a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law. The minister's response shows that the measure is rationally connected to this objective by restricting payments to registered worker entitlement funds which are subject to regulation.

2.213 With reference to international supervisory mechanisms, the minister is correct to note there are exceptions to the general rule that measures taken unilaterally to restrict the scope of negotiable outcomes will generally be incompatible with the right to collectively bargain. However, concerns remain as to the proportionality of these proposed measures in light of international jurisprudence.

2.214 While the minister's response explains that negotiation on certain subjects may be prohibited for reasons of public order, it is unclear how this particular measure relates to issues of public order. Further, even if the measure did address this issue, as set out at [2.207] above, it is unclear how prohibiting voluntarily negotiated clauses in general which require or permit contributions for the benefit of an employee (other than a superannuation fund, a registered worker entitlement fund or a registered charity) is the least rights restrictive approach to achieving the stated objective.

2.215 The minister's response further points to the terms of article 4 of ILO Convention No. 98 as a basis for how the measure is permissible. Article 4 relevantly provides that:

Measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements (emphasis added).

2.216 The minister's response appears to argue, drawing upon article 4, that the measure is appropriate to Australian conditions and so is permissible. However, the fact that a measure may (or may not) be appropriate to national conditions does not mean that they are necessarily permissible limitations on the right to collectively bargain under international law. Indeed, the 'measures appropriate to national conditions' referred to in article 4 are focused on those that are necessary to encourage and promote voluntary negotiation. That is, the term 'national conditions' operates not as an exception to obligations but is rather an acknowledgement that measures taken to fulfil article 4 need to take national conditions into account. By contrast, in this case, by prohibiting the inclusion of particular terms in an enterprise agreement, the measure interferes with voluntarily negotiated outcomes and thereby limits the right to collectively bargain.

2.217 Additionally, the minister's response did not address the committee's request for comment on the specific concerns raised by international monitoring bodies concerning Australia's restrictions on bargaining outcomes through prohibiting particular matters in enterprise agreements (discussed at [2.199] above). As noted previously, in light of the concerns raised by these international monitoring bodies as to the existing restrictions on bargaining outcomes in Australia, it is likely that any measures, such as this one (which further restrict such matters) would also raise concerns.

Committee response

2.218 The committee thanks the minister for his response and has concluded its examination of this issue. The committee acknowledges that the response was requested and received within a short timeframe.

2.219 The International Labour Organization's Committee on Freedom of Association has raised concerns in relation to Australia's restrictions on bargaining outcomes through prohibiting particular matters in enterprise agreements. The provisions introduced by the bill prohibiting terms of industrial agreements that require or permit payments to worker entitlement funds is a further restriction on bargaining outcomes.

2.220 Based on the information provided and the above analysis, prohibiting terms of industrial agreements that require or permit payments to worker entitlement funds is likely to be incompatible with the right to collectively bargain.

Regulation of worker entitlement funds

2.221 Schedule 2 of the bill would require 'worker entitlement funds' to meet requirements for registration and meet certain conditions relating to financial management, board composition, disclosure and how money is spent. A 'worker entitlement fund' is defined in proposed section 329HC of the Fair Work (Registered Organisations) Act 2009 (Registered Organisations Act) as a fund whose purposes include paying worker entitlements to members, dependents or legal representatives of fund members or a fund prescribed by the minister.

2.222 Under proposed new section 329LA of the Registered Organisations Act a 'worker entitlement fund' will only be able to be operated by a corporation and cannot be operated by a registered organisation (that is, a trade union or employer organisation.) Under proposed sections 329JA-B of the Registered Organisations Act it will be an offence to operate an unregistered fund and a civil penalty provision for employers to contribute to such a fund.

Compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of association and the right to just and favourable conditions at work

2.223 As described above, the interpretation of the right to freedom of association and the right to just and favourable conditions of work is informed by the ILO treaties.<sup>15</sup> ILO Convention 87 specifically protects the right of workers to autonomy of union processes, organising their administration and activities and formulating their own programs without interference.<sup>16</sup> Providing that registered organisations cannot administer 'worker entitlement funds' and limiting the purposes for which such money may be used appears to engage and limit these rights. However, the statement of compatibility does not acknowledge this limitation so does not provide an assessment of whether the limitation is permissible as a matter of international human rights law.<sup>17</sup>

2.224 The committee therefore requested the further advice of the minister as to:

- whether the measure is aimed at pursuing a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law;
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) its stated objective; and
- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve the stated objective (including whether the measure is the least rights restrictive way of achieving its stated objective).

Minister's first response

2.225 The minister's first response explained the scope of current provisions and proposed amendments:

Current provisions

An ASIC class order currently exempts worker entitlement funds from regulation under the Corporations Act 2001.

Contributions to 'approved worker entitlement funds' under the Fringe Benefits Tax Assessment Act 1986 (FBTA Act 1986) are exempt from fringe benefits tax. Funds can be approved if they meet certain minimum criteria, largely concerned with how fund money can be spent. This imposes a degree of indirect regulation on these funds.

Changes proposed through the Bill

The Bill will amend the Fair Work (Registered Organisations) Act 2009 (RO Act) to insert new Part 3C of Chapter 11 to apply governance, financial reporting and financial disclosure requirements to worker entitlement funds. As noted by the Committee, Schedule 2 of the Bill would require worker entitlement funds to meet requirements for registration and meet certain conditions relating to financial management, board composition, disclosure and how money is spent. These conditions include that a worker entitlement fund will only be able to be operated by a corporation and cannot be operated by a registered organisation (proposed new section 329LA condition 2).

2.226 The minister also provided a range of information as to whether the limitation on human rights imposed by the measure is permissible. In relation to whether the measure is aimed at pursuing a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law, the minister's response stated:

The objective of the Bill in relation to the administration of worker entitlement funds and limiting the purposes for which worker entitlement fund income and contributions can be used is to ensure that workers' entitlements are managed responsibly and transparently and in their interests. Funds will have to be run by trained professionals of good fame and character and fund money will be restricted from being re-characterised and spent for unauthorised purposes. These measures are intended to prohibit what the Royal Commission found were substantial payments flowing out of worker entitlement funds to other parties for purposes other than paying members.

2.227 This would appear to be a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law.

2.228 As to how the measure is effective to achieve the stated objective, the minister's response stated:

Requiring the registration of worker entitlement funds and placing conditions on that registration are measures that are rationally connected to the objective of ensuring that workers' entitlements are managed responsibly and transparently in their interests.

Requiring a fund operator to be a constitutional corporation is necessary to ensure that the provisions regulating such funds are valid. A similar requirement applies to superannuation funds under the Superannuation Industry (Supervision) Act 1993.

2.229 This information indicates that the regulation of worker entitlement funds is likely to be rationally connected to the stated objective of the measure.

2.230 The requirement that registered workers' entitlement funds cannot be operated by a registered organisation such as a trade union or employers' organisation raised questions in relation to the proportionality of the limitation. In this respect the minister's response explained that:

Requiring that a fund operator cannot be an organisation is designed to prevent conflicts of interest for worker entitlement funds that also make substantial payments to those organisations for purposes other than paying members worker entitlements.

In this respect, the Royal Commission stated that:

The very substantial revenue flows to unions generate significant conflicts of interest and potential breaches of fiduciary duty on the part of unions and union officials negotiating enterprise agreements ... In short, the union and union officials owe a duty to act in the interests of union member employees when negotiating enterprise agreements. At the same time, there is a significant potential and incentive for the union to act in its own interests to generate revenue.

The worker entitlement fund, Incolink, provides an example of the substantial revenue that flows to unions and employer groups. Between 2011 and 2015, the Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (CFMEU), the Master Builders Association of Victoria and the Plumbing Joint Training Fund together received over $85 million from Incolink. These organisations are all represented on the board of Incolink.

In addition, none of the existing worker entitlement funds that are approved under the FBTA Act 1986 are operated by registered organisations; most worker entitlement funds are run by corporations with a mix of representatives from employer and employee associations on their boards. The Bill does not alter this position. Officers of registered organisations can still sit on the board of worker entitlement funds.

2.231 The minister's response articulated that there is a potential for conflicts of interest in relation to the administration of such funds as well as the potentially large sums of money involved. It is also relevant to the proportionality of the measure that none of the funds registered under the existing FBTA Act are operated by registered organisations. However, it was unclear whether there are funds that are not registered under the FBTA Act which are currently administered by registered organisations. Accordingly, based on the information provided there is some uncertainty as to the potential impact of the measure. The measure may still therefore be a significant limitation on the right for a union to organise its internal affairs and formulate its own program. For example, notwithstanding the issues raised in the minister's response, it may be the preference of some union members that money paid for their benefit is administered by their union.

2.232 The minister's response further stated, in relation to whether the measure is proportionate to achieve its stated objective, that:

The Bill also retains the existing legal limits on how contributions and income of a fund can be spent under the FBTA Act 1986.

To the extent that these measures may limit human rights, any limitation is reasonable and proportionate in achieving the objectives of the Bill. Commensurate with this, the measures are the least rights restrictive as they do not prevent contributions to worker entitlement funds but provide appropriate governance and transparency to ensure that workers' entitlements are managed responsibly and transparently in their interests. They also take into account the feedback provided by funds during consultation, including to allow funds to use income to pay for training and welfare services, subject to appropriate criteria, and the provision of a separate regulatory scheme for single employer worker entitlement funds.

2.233 While noting that contributions will still be able to be made to registered workers' entitlement funds, it was unclear from the information provided that this necessarily means that the measure is the least rights restrictive approach. It was unclear from the response whether there are any other reasonably available less rights restrictive alternatives to prohibiting registered organisations from operating such funds in general. Accordingly, it was uncertain whether the measure constitutes a proportionate limitation on the right to freedom of association.

2.234 Based on the information provided and the above analysis, the committee was unable to conclude that the measure is a proportionate limitation on the right to freedom of association and the right to just and favourable conditions at work.

Prohibiting terms of industrial instruments requiring payments to election funds

2.235 Schedule 3 of the bill would amend the Fair Work Act to prohibit any term of a modern award, enterprise agreement or contract of employment permitting or requiring employee contributions to an election fund.<sup>18</sup>

Compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of association and the right to just and favourable conditions at work

2.236 As set out above, the right to freedom of association includes the right to collectively bargain without unreasonable and disproportionate interference from the state. Prohibiting the inclusion of particular terms in an enterprise agreement interferes with the outcomes of the bargaining process. Accordingly, the initial analysis stated that the measure engages and limits the right to just and favourable conditions of work and the right to collectively bargain as an aspect of the right to freedom of association. The statement of compatibility acknowledges that the measure engages the right to negotiate terms and conditions of employment voluntarily.<sup>19</sup> However, the statement of compatibility appears to indicate that the limitation is permissible.

2.237 The statement of compatibility identifies one objective of the measure as being to 'remove any legal or practical compulsion on an employee to contribute to election funds'.<sup>20</sup> This appears to be a description of what the measure does rather than articulating the pressing or substantial concern the measure addresses as required to constitute a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law. The statement of compatibility identifies a second objective as addressing 'the possibility of contributions made in accordance with a relevant instrument being used to avoid the intent of the prohibition on organisations using their resources to favour a particular candidate'. While this could be capable of constituting a legitimate objective, limited explanation or reasoning is provided as to why this objective is important. Further, in relation to whether the measure is rationally connected (that is, effective to achieve) and proportionate to the stated objectives, the statement of compatibility provides no reasoning or evidence and only asserts that the measure 'is reasonable, necessary and proportionate'.<sup>21</sup>

2.238 The committee therefore requested the further advice of the minister as to:

- whether there is reasoning or evidence that establishes that the stated objective addresses a pressing or substantial concern or whether the proposed changes are otherwise aimed at achieving a legitimate objective;
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) its stated objective; and
- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve the stated objective (including whether the measure is the least rights restrictive way of achieving its stated objective).

Minister's first response

2.239 The minister's first response provided the following information about the proposed amendments:

Current provisions

There are currently no provisions in the FW Act or RO Act that deal with terms of industrial instruments requiring or permitting employees to pay into election funds. This is despite the fact that section 190 of the RO Act prohibits an organisation from using its resources for the purposes of the election of a particular candidate. Because election funds are structurally separate from the organisation, they are not captured by this provision.

Changes proposed through the Bill

Schedule 3 of the Bill would amend section 194 of the FW Act to prohibit any term of an enterprise agreement or contract of employment requiring or permitting employee contributions for a regulated election purpose.

Schedule 3 would also amend Part 2-9 of the FW Act to provide that any term of a contract of employment requiring or permitting payments for a regulated election purpose will have no effect.

21 SOC, p. x.

A 'regulated election purpose' is one that includes the purpose of funding, supporting or promoting the election of candidates for election to office in an industrial association.

2.240 The minister's response provided some further information about whether the limitation on human rights was permissible. In relation to whether the measure addresses a substantial or pressing concern, the minister's response explained:

Election funds are established to fund election campaigns for office within registered organisations and are regularly sourced from contributions from employees of such organisations. These funds are usually managed by one or more individuals who hold elected office within the organisation. They are not established in the interests of workers who are subject to the collective agreement but rather the interests of officials of the bargaining representative. The Royal Commission found that such arrangements unfairly disadvantage candidates who are not already in office and have been misused by officials controlling the funds where there are no contested elections. The Royal Commission also found a lack of oversight of election funds, with information about revenue and expenditure sometimes hidden, or not kept at all.

The amendments remove any legal or practical compulsion on employees to contribute to a particular election fund. They ensure employees have a choice about whether to contribute to the particular fund.

2.241 Based on this information, ensuring that non-incumbent candidates for elected union positions are not disadvantaged and that employees have a free choice about whether to contribute to a particular fund in the particular circumstances, would appear to constitute legitimate objectives for the purposes of international human rights law. The measures would also appear to be rationally connected to these objectives.

2.242 In relation to whether the measure is reasonable and proportionate, the minister's response states that registered organisation employees will still be able to make genuine contributions, voluntarily and independently of an industrial instrument. On balance, this would appear to be a proportionate limitation on bargaining outcomes.

2.243 The committee therefore noted that the measure appears to be compatible with the right to freedom of association and the right to just and favourable conditions of work.

Prohibiting any action with the intent to coerce a person or employer to pay amounts to a particular fund

2.244 Schedule 4 of the bill would introduce a civil penalty into section 355A of the Fair Work Act prohibiting a person from organising, taking or threatening to take any action, other than protected industrial action, with the intent to coerce a person to pay amounts to a particular worker entitlement fund, super fund, training fund, welfare fund or employee insurance scheme.<sup>22</sup>

Compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of association

2.245 The right to strike is protected as an aspect of the right to freedom of association and the right to form and join trade unions under article 8 of ICESCR. The right to strike, however, is not absolute and may be limited in certain circumstances.

2.246 By prohibiting action (other than protected industrial action) intended to coerce a person to pay amounts into a particular fund, the initial analysis assessed that the measure further engages and limits the right to strike. This is because it may impose an additional penalty or disincentive to taking unprotected industrial action with the intent of influencing the conduct of an employer. The existing restrictions on taking industrial action under Australian domestic law have been consistently criticised by international supervisory mechanisms as going beyond what is permissible.<sup>23</sup> While the statement of compatibility acknowledges that the measure engages work-related rights it does not expressly acknowledge that the right to strike is an aspect of the right to freedom of association.

2.247 Beyond providing a description of the measure, the statement of compatibility does not identify the legitimate objective of the measure. While the statement of compatibility appears to argue that the measure in fact supports freedom of association and human rights, it provides no explanation of the reasoning for this.<sup>24</sup> The statement of compatibility therefore does not meet the standards outlined in the committee's Guidance Note 1, which require that where a limitation on a right is proposed the statement of compatibility provide a reasoned and

The Committee recommends that the State party bring its legislation on trade union rights into line with article 8 of the Covenant and with the provisions of the relevant International Labour Organization (ILO) Conventions (nos. 87 and 98), particularly by removing penalties, including six months of incarceration, for industrial action, or the secret ballot requirements for workers who wish to take industrial action'. evidence-based assessment of how the measure pursues a legitimate objective, is rationally connected to that objective, and is proportionate.

2.248 The committee therefore requested the further advice of the minister as to:

- whether the measure is aimed at achieving a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law;
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) that objective; and
- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve the stated objective (including any relevant safeguards and whether the measure is the least rights restrictive way of achieving its stated objective).

Minister's first response

2.249 The minister's first response provided the following information about the proposed amendments:

Current provisions

Part 3-1 of the FW Act provides for general workplace protections. It contains specific prohibitions against coercive behaviour in relation to workplace rights (section 343) and industrial activities (348). However, the Part does not specifically prohibit coercive action in relation to the making [of] payments to certain funds, particularly where such action occurs outside of the enterprise bargaining process. These funds include superannuation funds, training and welfare funds, worker entitlement funds and insurance arrangements and are collectively referred to by the Royal Commission as 'worker benefit funds'.

Changes proposed through the Bill

Schedule 4 of the Bill would amend Part 3-1 of the FW Act to insert a new section 355A to prohibit a person from taking coercive action in relation to the making of payments to a particular worker benefit fund. This would fix an existing gap in the Act, which prohibits coercion in relation to a wide range of other conduct, but not in relation to contributions to funds.

2.250 In relation to the current law, the minister's response stated that 'compelling contributions to a particular worker benefit fund infringes basic principles of freedom of association and, by prohibiting mandatory contributions, the amendment is in fact promoting human rights'. However, the response did not specifically explain how 'compelling' a contribution through, for example, protest or strike action would 'infringe' principles of freedom of association or promote human rights. As noted in the initial analysis, the measure, by prohibiting action (other than protected industrial action) intended to influence or 'coerce' a person to pay amounts into a particular fund, the measure further engages and limits the right to strike. This is because it may impose an additional penalty or disincentive to taking unprotected industrial action with the intent of influencing the conduct of an employer.

2.251 In relation to whether the measure imposes permissible limitations on the right to strike, the minister's response stated that the measure pursues the 'legitimate objective of reducing the potential for coercive behaviour outside the enterprise bargaining process, for example in side deals'. In this respect, the minister's response discussed examples of pressure being applied to employers, potential conflicts of interest and the findings of the Heydon Royal Commission. While not articulated in this way in the minister's response, it may be that the measure pursues the objective of providing protection for employers or other people from particular forms of action. To the extent that the measure is aimed at protecting the rights and freedoms of others this was noted as being capable of constituting a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law.

2.252 The minister's response further noted that 'the Bill does not alter the circumstances in which industrial action will be considered protected industrial action, or the consequences provided for failures to comply with Part 3-3 of the FW Act, dealing with industrial action'. However, as set out above, the existing restrictions on taking industrial action under Australian domestic law have been consistently criticised by international supervisory mechanisms as going beyond what is permissible.<sup>25</sup> Such findings call into serious question whether any further restrictions on the right to strike, such as this one, are permissible. While the minister's response identified that the measure addresses a gap in current restrictions, it did not explain how such restrictions are proportionate in view of the stated objective including whether they represent the least rights restrictive approach.

2.253 Accordingly, based on the information available, the measure did not appear to be a proportionate limitation on the right to strike as an aspect of the right to freedom of association.

25 See, UN Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights (UNCESCR), Concluding Observations on Australia, E/C.12/AUS/CO/5 (23 June 2017) [29]-30: 'The Committee is also concerned that the right to strike remains constrained in the State party (art. 8). The Committee recommends that the State party bring its legislation on trade union rights into line with article 8 of the Covenant and with the provisions of the relevant International Labour Organization (ILO) Conventions (nos. 87 and 98), particularly by removing penalties, including six months of incarceration, for industrial action, or the secret ballot requirements for workers who wish to take industrial action'. Compatibility of the measure with the right to freedom of assembly and expression

2.254 The right to freedom of assembly and the right to freedom of expression are protected by articles 19 and 21 of the ICCPR. The right to freedom of assembly and the right to freedom of expression may be limited for certain prescribed purposes. That is, that the limitation is necessary to respect the rights of others, to protect national security, public safety, public order, public health or morals. Additionally, such limitations must be prescribed by law, reasonable, necessary and proportionate to achieving the prescribed purpose.

2.255 The initial analysis stated that it appears that the measure may extend to prohibiting forms of expression or assembly. As such, it may engage and limit the right to freedom of expression and assembly. The prohibition on forms of protest action appears to be potentially quite broad. This issue was not addressed in the statement of compatibility and as such it is unclear whether the measure is compatible with these rights.

2.256 The committee therefore sought the advice of the minister as to:

- the scope of any restriction on the right to freedom of expression and assembly;
- whether the measure is aimed at achieving a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law;
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) its stated objective; and
- whether the limitation is a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve the stated objective (including whether the measure is sufficiently circumscribed, any relevant safeguards and whether the measure is the least rights restrictive way of achieving its stated objective).

2.257 In relation to the right to freedom of assembly and the right to freedom of expression, the minister's first response stated:

The Committee is also concerned that the measure circumscribes the right to freedom of expression as set out in Article 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the right of peaceful assembly set out in Article 21 of the ICCPR. It is not clear how the relevant rights are engaged as the measure does not interfere with an individual's right to hold opinions without interference, the right to freedom of expression or the freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of any kind or the right of peaceful assembly. In any event, the amendment pursues the legitimate objective of ensuring that a person cannot coerce another person to make payments into certain worker benefit funds and is reasonable and proportionate.

2.258 The particular concern articulated in the initial human rights analysis was that the prohibited forms of action may extend to forms of expression and assembly. For example, protest activities outside of a workplace or a boycott of goods that is aimed at influencing or 'coercing' a person to make payments into a particular fund. It was noted in this respect that the right of freedom of expression extends to the expression of ideas through a range of conduct including speech and public protest. It would have been useful if the minister's response provided an explanation of why she does not consider that these rights were engaged and limited. There is also a question about the breadth of the provision, noting it could potentially apply broadly beyond the employer-employee relationship. As such, it was unclear whether the breadth of this provision may be overly broad with respect to an objective, for example, of protecting the rights and freedoms of others.

2.259 As the information provided to the committee did not include a substantive assessment as to whether any limitation on the right to freedom of expression and assembly is permissible, it was not possible to conclude that the measure is proportionate.

Appendix 2

Short guide to human rights

4.1 The following guide contains short descriptions of human rights regularly considered by the committee. State parties to the seven principal human rights treaties are under a binding obligation to respect, protect and promote each of these rights. For more detailed descriptions please refer to the committee's Guide to human rights.<sup>1</sup>

4.2 Some human rights obligations are absolute under international law, that is, a state cannot lawfully limit the enjoyment of an absolute right in any circumstances. The prohibition on slavery is an example. However, in relation to most human rights, a necessary and proportionate limitation on the enjoyment of a right may be justified under international law. For further information regarding when limitations on rights are permissible, please refer to the committee's Guidance Note 1 (see Appendix 4).<sup>2</sup>

Right to life

Article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR); and article 1 of the Second Optional Protocol to the ICCPR

4.3 The right to life has three core elements:

- it prohibits the state from arbitrarily killing a person;
- it imposes an obligation on the state to protect people from being killed by others or identified risks; and
- it imposes on the state a duty to undertake an effective and proper investigation into all deaths where the state is involved (discussed below, [4.5]).

4.4 Australia is also prohibited from imposing the death penalty.

Duty to investigate

Articles 2 and 6 of the ICCPR

4.5 The right to life requires there to be an effective official investigation into deaths resulting from state use of force and where the state has failed to protect life. Such an investigation must:

- be brought by the state in good faith and on its own initiative;
- be carried out promptly;

2 Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Guidance Note 1 (December 2014).

- be independent and impartial; and
- involve the family of the deceased, and allow the family access to all information relevant to the investigation.

Prohibition against torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment

Article 7 of the ICCPR; and the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT)

4.6 The prohibition against torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is absolute. This means that torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is not permissible under any circumstances.

4.7 The prohibition contains a number of elements:

- it prohibits the state from subjecting a person to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading practices, particularly in places of detention;
- it precludes the use of evidence obtained through torture;
- it prevents the deportation or extradition of a person to a place where there is a substantial risk they will be tortured or treated inhumanely (see also non-refoulement obligations, [4.9] to [4.11]); and
- it requires an effective investigation into any allegations of such treatment and steps to prevent such treatment occurring.

4.8 The aim of the prohibition against torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment is to protect the dignity of the person and relates not only to acts causing physical pain but also acts causing mental suffering. The prohibition is also an aspect of the right to humane treatment in detention (see below, [4.18]).

Non-refoulement obligations

Article 3 of the CAT; articles 2, 6(1) and 7 of the ICCPR; and Second Optional Protocol to the ICCPR

4.9 Non-refoulement obligations are absolute and may not be subject to any limitations.

4.10 Australia has non-refoulement obligations under both the ICCPR and the CAT, as well as under the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and its Protocol (Refugee Convention). This means that Australia must not under any circumstances return a person (including a person who is not a refugee) to a country where there is a real risk that they would face persecution, torture or other serious forms of harm, such as the death penalty; arbitrary deprivation of life; or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

4.11 Effective and impartial review by a court or tribunal of decisions to deport or remove a person, including merits review in the Australian context, is integral to complying with non-refoulement obligations.

Prohibition against slavery and forced labour

Article 8 of the ICCPR

4.12 The prohibition against slavery, servitude and forced labour is a fundamental and absolute human right. This means that slavery and forced labour are not permissible under any circumstances.

4.13 The prohibition on slavery and servitude is a prohibition on 'owning' another person or exploiting or dominating another person and subjecting them to 'slavery-like' conditions.

4.14 The right to be free from forced or compulsory labour prohibits requiring a person to undertake work that they have not voluntarily consented to, but which they do because of either physical or psychological threats. The prohibition does not include lawful work required of prisoners or those in the military; work required during an emergency; or work or service that is a part of normal civic obligations (for example, jury service).

4.15 The state must not subject anyone to slavery or forced labour, and ensure adequate laws and measures are in place to prevent individuals or companies from subjecting people to such treatment (for example, laws and measures to prevent trafficking).

Right to liberty and security of the person

Article 9 of the ICCPR

Right to liberty

4.16 The right to liberty of the person is a procedural guarantee not to be arbitrarily and unlawfully deprived of liberty. It applies to all forms of deprivation of liberty, including detention in criminal cases, immigration detention, forced detention in hospital, detention for military discipline and detention to control the spread of contagious diseases. Core elements of this right are:

- the prohibition against arbitrary detention, which requires that detention must be lawful, reasonable, necessary and proportionate in all the circumstances, and be subject to regular review;
- the right to reasons for arrest or other deprivation of liberty, and to be informed of criminal charge;
- the rights of people detained on a criminal charge, including being promptly brought before a judicial officer to decide if they should continue to be detained, and being tried within a reasonable time or otherwise released (these rights are linked to criminal process rights, discussed below);
- the right to challenge the lawfulness of any form of detention in a court that has the power to order the release of the person, including a right to have access to legal representation, and to be informed of that right in order to effectively challenge the detention; and

- the right to compensation for unlawful arrest or detention.

Right to security of the person

4.17 The right to security of the person requires the state to take steps to protect people from others interfering with their personal integrity. This includes protecting people who may be subject to violence, death threats, assassination attempts, harassment and intimidation (for example, protecting people from domestic violence).

Right to humane treatment in detention

Article 10 of the ICCPR

4.18 The right to humane treatment in detention provides that all people deprived of their liberty, in any form of state detention, must be treated with humanity and dignity. The right complements the prohibition on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (see above, [4.6] to [4.8]). The obligations on the state include:

- a prohibition on subjecting a person in detention to inhumane treatment (for example, lengthy solitary confinement or unreasonable restrictions on contact with family and friends);
- monitoring and supervision of places of detention to ensure detainees are treated appropriately;
- instruction and training for officers with authority over people deprived of their liberty;
- complaint and review mechanisms for people deprived of their liberty; and
- adequate medical facilities and health care for people deprived of their liberty, particularly people with disability and pregnant women.

Freedom of movement

Article 12 of the ICCPR

4.19 The right to freedom of movement provides that:

- people lawfully within any country have the right to move freely within that country;
- people have the right to leave any country, including the right to obtain travel documents without unreasonable delay; and
- no one can be arbitrarily denied the right to enter or remain in his or her own country.

Right to a fair trial and fair hearing

Articles 14(1) (fair trial and fair hearing), 14(2) (presumption of innocence) and 14(3)-(7) (minimum guarantees) of the ICCPR

4.20 The right to a fair hearing is a fundamental part of the rule of law, procedural fairness and the proper administration of justice. The right provides that all persons are:

- equal before courts and tribunals; and
- entitled to a fair and public hearing before an independent and impartial court or tribunal established by law.

4.21 The right to a fair hearing applies in both criminal and civil proceedings, including whenever rights and obligations are to be determined.

Presumption of innocence

Article 14(2) of the ICCPR

4.22 This specific guarantee protects the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty of a criminal offence according to law. Generally, consistency with the presumption of innocence requires the prosecution to prove each element of a criminal offence beyond reasonable doubt (the committee's Guidance Note 2 provides further information on offence provisions (see Appendix 4)).

Minimum guarantees in criminal proceedings

Article 14(2)-(7) of the ICCPR

4.23 These specific guarantees apply when a person has been charged with a criminal offence or are otherwise subject to a penalty which may be considered criminal, and include:

- the presumption of innocence (see above, [4.22]);
- the right not to incriminate oneself (the ill-treatment of a person to obtain a confession may also breach the prohibition on torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment (see above, [4.6] to [4.8]));
- the right not to be tried or punished twice (double jeopardy);
- the right to appeal a conviction or sentence and the right to compensation for wrongful conviction; and
- other specific guarantees, including the right to be promptly informed of any charge, to have adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence, to be tried in person without undue delay, to examine witnesses, to choose and meet with a lawyer and to have access to effective legal aid.

Prohibition against retrospective criminal laws

Article 15 of the ICCPR

4.24 The prohibition against retrospective criminal laws provides that:

- no-one can be found guilty of a crime that was not a crime under the law at the time the act was committed;
- anyone found guilty of a criminal offence cannot be given a heavier penalty than one that applied at the time the offence was committed; and
- if, after an offence is committed, a lighter penalty is introduced into the law, the lighter penalty should apply to the offender. This includes a right to benefit from the retrospective decriminalisation of an offence (if the person is yet to be penalised).

4.25 The prohibition against retrospective criminal laws does not apply to conduct which, at the time it was committed, was recognised under international law as being criminal even if it was not a crime under Australian law (for example, genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity).

Right to privacy

Article 17 of the ICCPR

4.26 The right to privacy prohibits unlawful or arbitrary interference with a person's private, family, home life or correspondence. It requires the state:

- not to arbitrarily or unlawfully invade a person's privacy; and
- to adopt legislative and other measures to protect people from arbitrary interference with their privacy by others (including corporations).

4.27 The right to privacy contains the following elements:

- respect for private life, including information privacy (for example, respect for private and confidential information and the right to control the storing, use and sharing of personal information);
- the right to personal autonomy and physical and psychological integrity, including respect for reproductive autonomy and autonomy over one's own body (for example, in relation to medical testing);
- the right to respect for individual sexuality (prohibiting regulation of private consensual adult sexual activity);
- the prohibition on unlawful and arbitrary state surveillance;
- respect for the home (prohibiting arbitrary interference with a person's home and workplace including by unlawful surveillance, unlawful entry or arbitrary evictions);

- respect for family life (prohibiting interference with personal family relationships);
- respect for correspondence (prohibiting arbitrary interception or censoring of a person's mail, email and web access), including respect for professional duties of confidentiality; and
- the right to reputation.

Right to protection of the family

Articles 17 and 23 of the ICCPR; and article 10 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR)

4.28 Under human rights law the family is recognised as the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is therefore entitled to protection. The right requires the state:

- not to arbitrarily or unlawfully interfere in family life; and
- to adopt measures to protect the family, including by funding or supporting bodies that protect the family.

4.29 The right also encompasses:

- the right to marry (with full and free consent) and found a family;
- the right to equality in marriage (for example, laws protecting spouses equally) and protection of any children on divorce;
- protection for new mothers, including maternity leave; and
- family unification.

Right to freedom of thought and religion

Article 18 of the ICCPR

4.30 The right to hold a religious or other belief or opinion is absolute and may not be subject to any limitations.

4.31 However, the right to exercise one's belief may be subject to limitations given its potential impact on others.

4.32 The right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion includes:

- the freedom to choose and change religion or belief;
- the freedom to exercise religion or belief publicly or privately, alone or with others (including through wearing religious dress);
- the freedom to exercise religion or belief in worship, teaching, practice and observance; and
- the right to have no religion and to have non-religious beliefs protected (for example, philosophical beliefs such as pacifism or veganism).

4.33 The right to freedom of thought and religion also includes the right of a person not to be coerced in any way that might impair their ability to have or adopt a religion or belief of their own choice. The right to freedom of religion prohibits the state from impairing, through legislative or other measures, a person's freedom of religion; and requires it to take steps to prevent others from coercing persons into following a particular religion or changing their religion.

Right to freedom of opinion and expression

Articles 19 and 20 of the ICCPR; and article 21 of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD)

4.34 The right to freedom of opinion is the right to hold opinions without interference. This right is absolute and may not be subject to any limitations.

4.35 The right to freedom of expression relates to the communication of information or ideas through any medium, including written and oral communications, the media, public protest, broadcasting, artistic works and commercial advertising. It may be subject to permissible limitations.

Right to freedom of assembly

Article 21 of the ICCPR

4.36 The right to peaceful assembly is the right of people to gather as a group for a specific purpose. The right prevents the state from imposing unreasonable and disproportionate restrictions on assemblies, including:

- unreasonable requirements for advance notification of a peaceful demonstration (although reasonable prior notification requirements are likely to be permissible);
- preventing a peaceful demonstration from going ahead or preventing people from joining a peaceful demonstration;
- stopping or disrupting a peaceful demonstration;
- punishing people for their involvement in a peaceful demonstration or storing personal information on a person simply because of their involvement in a peaceful demonstration; and
- failing to protect participants in a peaceful demonstration from disruption by others.

Right to freedom of association

Article 22 of the ICCPR; and article 8 of the ICESCR

4.37 The right to freedom of association with others is the right to join with others in a group to pursue common interests. This includes the right to join political parties, trade unions, professional and sporting clubs and non-governmental organisations.

4.38 The right prevents the state from imposing unreasonable and disproportionate restrictions on the right to form associations and trade unions, including:

- preventing people from forming or joining an association;
- imposing procedures for the formal recognition of associations that effectively prevent or discourage people from forming an association;
- punishing people for their membership of a group; and
- protecting the right to strike and collectively bargain.

4.39 Limitations on the right are not permissible if they are inconsistent with the guarantees of freedom of association and the right to organise as contained in the International Labour Organisation Convention of 1948 concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize (ILO Convention No. 87).

Right to take part in public affairs

Article 25 of the ICCPR

4.40 The right to take part in public affairs includes guarantees of the right of Australian citizens to stand for public office, to vote in elections and to have access to positions in public service. Given the importance of free speech and protest to the conduct of public affairs in a free and open democracy, the realisation of the right to take part in public affairs depends on the protection of other key rights, such as freedom of expression, association and assembly.

4.41 The right to take part in public affairs is an essential part of democratic government that is accountable to the people. It applies to all levels of government, including local government.

Right to equality and non-discrimination

Articles 2, 3 and 26 of the ICCPR; articles 2 and 3 of the ICESCR; International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD); Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW); CRPD; and article 2 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC)

4.42 The right to equality and non-discrimination is a fundamental human right that is essential to the protection and respect of all human rights. The human rights treaties provide that everyone is entitled to enjoy their rights without discrimination of any kind, and that all people are equal before the law and entitled to the equal and non-discriminatory protection of the law.

4.43 'Discrimination' under the ICCPR encompasses both measures that have a discriminatory intent (direct discrimination) and measures which have a discriminatory effect on the enjoyment of rights (indirect discrimination).<sup>3</sup> The UN Human Rights Committee has explained indirect discrimination as 'a rule or measure that is neutral on its face or without intent to discriminate', which exclusively or disproportionately affects people with a particular personal attribute.<sup>4</sup>

4.44 The right to equality and non-discrimination requires that the state:

- ensure all laws are non-discriminatory and are enforced in a non-discriminatory way;
- ensure all laws are applied in a non-discriminatory and non-arbitrary manner (equality before the law);
- have laws and measures in place to ensure that people are not subjected to discrimination by others (for example, in areas such as employment, education and the provision of goods and services); and
- take non-legal measures to tackle discrimination, including through education.

CRC

4.45 Children have special rights under human rights law taking into account their particular vulnerabilities. Children's rights are protected under a number of treaties, particularly the CRC. All children under the age of 18 years are guaranteed these rights, which include:

- the right to develop to the fullest;
- the right to protection from harmful influences, abuse and exploitation;
- family rights; and
- the right to access health care, education and services that meet their needs.

Obligation to consider the best interests of the child

Articles 3 and 10 of the CRC

4.46 Under the CRC, states are required to ensure that, in all actions concerning children, the best interests of the child are a primary consideration. This requires active measures to protect children's rights and promote their survival, growth and wellbeing, as well as measures to support and assist parents and others who have

3 The prohibited grounds of discrimination are race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status. Under 'other status' the following have been held to qualify as prohibited grounds: age, nationality, marital status, disability, place of residence within a country and sexual orientation. The prohibited grounds of discrimination are often described as 'personal attributes'.

4 Althammer v Austria HRC 998/01, [10.2]. See above, for a list of 'personal attributes'.

day-to-day responsibility for ensuring recognition of children's rights. It requires legislative, administrative and judicial bodies and institutions to systematically consider how children's rights and interests are or will be affected directly or indirectly by their decisions and actions.

4.47 Australia is required to treat applications by minors for family reunification in a positive, humane and expeditious manner. This obligation is consistent with articles 17 and 23 of the ICCPR, which prohibit interference with the family and require family unity to be protected by society and the state (see above, [4.29]).

Right of the child to be heard in judicial and administrative proceedings

Article 12 of the CRC

4.48 The right of the child to be heard in judicial and administrative proceedings provides that states assure to a child capable of forming his or her own views the right to express those views freely in all matters affecting them. The views of the child must be given due weight in accordance with their age and maturity.

4.49 In particular, this right requires that the child is provided the opportunity to be heard in any judicial and administrative proceedings affecting them, either directly or through a representative or an appropriate body.

Right to nationality

Articles 7 and 8 of the CRC; and article 24(3) of the ICCPR

4.50 The right to nationality provides that every child has the right to acquire a nationality. Accordingly, Australia is required to adopt measures, both internally and in cooperation with other countries, to ensure that every child has a nationality when born. The CRC also provides that children have the right to preserve their identity, including their nationality, without unlawful interference.

4.51 This is consistent with Australia's obligations under the Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness 1961, which requires Australia to grant its nationality to a person born in its territory who would otherwise be stateless, and not to deprive a person of their nationality if it would render the person stateless.

Right to self-determination

Article 1 of the ICESCR; and article 1 of the ICCPR

4.52 The right to self-determination includes the entitlement of peoples to have control over their destiny and to be treated respectfully. The right is generally understood as accruing to 'peoples', and includes peoples being free to pursue their economic, social and cultural development. There are two aspects of the meaning of self-determination under international law:

- that the people of a country have the right not to be subjected to external domination and exploitation and have the right to determine their own political status (most commonly seen in relation to colonised states); and

- that groups within a country, such as those with a common racial or cultural identity, particularly Indigenous people, have the right to a level of internal self-determination.

4.53 Accordingly, it is important that individuals and groups, particularly Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, should be consulted about decisions likely to affect them. This includes ensuring that they have the opportunity to participate in the making of such decisions through the processes of democratic government, and are able to exercise meaningful control over their affairs.

Rights to and at work

Articles 6(1), 7 and 8 of the ICESCR

Right to work

4.54 The right to work is the right of all people to have the opportunity to gain their living through decent work they freely choose, allowing them to live in dignity. It provides:

- that everyone must be able to freely accept or choose their work, including that a person must not be forced in any way to engage in employment;
- a right not to be unfairly deprived of work, including minimum due process rights if employment is to be terminated; and
- that there is a system of protection guaranteeing access to employment.

Right to just and favourable conditions of work

4.55 The right to just and favourable conditions of work provides that all workers have the right to just and favourable conditions of work, particularly adequate and fair remuneration, safe working conditions, and the right to join trade unions.

Right to social security

Article 9 of the ICESCR

4.56 The right to social security recognises the importance of adequate social benefits in reducing the effects of poverty and plays an important role in realising many other economic, social and cultural rights, in particular the right to an adequate standard of living and the right to health.

4.57 Access to social security is required when a person lacks access to other income and is left with insufficient means to access health care and support themselves and their dependents. Enjoyment of the right requires that sustainable social support schemes are:

- available to people in need;
- adequate to support an adequate standard of living and health care;

- accessible (providing universal coverage without discrimination; and qualifying and withdrawal conditions that are lawful, reasonable, proportionate and transparent); and
- affordable (where contributions are required).

Right to an adequate standard of living

4.58 The right to an adequate standard of living requires that the state take steps to ensure the availability, adequacy and accessibility of food, clothing, water and housing for all people in its jurisdiction.

Right to health

Article 12 of the ICESCR

4.59 The right to health is the right to enjoy the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health. It is a right to have access to adequate health care (including reproductive and sexual healthcare) as well as to live in conditions that promote a healthy life (such as access to safe drinking water, housing, food and a healthy environment).

Right to education

Articles 13 and 14 of the ICESCR; and article 28 of the CRC

4.60 This right recognises the right of everyone to education. It recognises that education must be directed to the full development of the human personality and sense of dignity, and to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It requires that primary education shall be compulsorily and freely available to all; and the progressive introduction of free secondary and higher education.

Right to culture

Article 15 of the ICESCR; and article 27 of the ICCPR

4.61 The right to culture provides that all people have the right to benefit from and take part in cultural life. The right also includes the right of everyone to benefit from scientific progress; and protection of the moral and material interests of the authors of scientific, literary or artistic productions.

4.62 Individuals belonging to minority groups have additional protections to enjoy their own culture, religion and language. The right applies to people who belong to minority groups in a state sharing a common culture, religion and/or language.

Right to an effective remedy

Article 2 of the ICCPR

4.63 The right to an effective remedy requires states to ensure access to an effective remedy for violations of human rights. States are required to establish appropriate judicial and administrative mechanisms for addressing claims of human rights violations under domestic law. Where public officials have committed violations of rights, states may not relieve perpetrators from personal responsibility through amnesties or legal immunities and indemnities.

4.64 States are required to make reparation to individuals whose rights have been violated. Reparation can involve restitution, rehabilitation and measures of satisfaction—such as public apologies, public memorials, guarantees of non-repetition and changes in relevant laws and practices—as well as bringing to justice the perpetrators of human rights violations. Effective remedies should be appropriately adapted to take account of the special vulnerability of certain categories of persons including, and particularly, children.

ASSISTANT MINISTER TO THE TREASURER

Mr Ian Goodenough
Chair
Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights
Parliament House
CANBERRA ACT 2600

Dear Mr Goodenough

Ian

Thank you for your correspondence of 29 November 2017 addressed to the Treasurer regarding the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights' legislation report 12 of 2017 request for advice on whether the civil penalty provisions in the ASIC Credit (Flexible Credit Cost Arrangements) Instrument 2017/780 (the instrument) may be considered 'criminal' under international human rights law. The Treasurer has asked me to respond. I apologise for the delay in responding to you.

As you are aware, the instrument was made by the Australian Securities and Investments Commission (ASIC) on 7 September 2017 and prohibits flex commissions – a type of commission payable to lenders to car deals – from 1 November 2018. The Committee commented in its report that the size of the maximum civil penalty for breaches of the instrument's provisions raises the concern that it may be considered 'criminal' for the purposes of international human rights law.

The Explanatory Statement to the instrument explains that the use of flex commissions contributes to consumer harm due to distortions in the pricing of car finance. In particular, ASIC has identified that consumer harm from flex commissions disproportionately affects vulnerable customers. Due to the detrimental effect that these commissions have on vulnerable consumers, it is important that penalties in this area have a genuine deterrent effect. The Government considers that the maximum civil penalty of $420,000 is appropriate given the potential consumer detriment that may result from contravention.

In relation to the Committee's concerns, and taking into account the Committee's Guidance Note 2 on offence provisions, civil penalties and human rights, the following factors support the view that the civil penalties included in the flex commissions instrument are not criminal in nature:

- the $420,000 penalty is not a criminal penalty under Australian law;
- the maximum penalty applies exclusively to Australian credit licensees and exempt special purpose funding entities, and not to the general public; and
- the proportionate size of the maximum penalty, given the corporate nature of the financial services industry. Further, the maximum penalty is consistent with penalties imposed by other provisions in Chapter 2 of the National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (the Credit Act), for example, sections 69 and 70 of the Credit Act.

Given these factors, the Government considers that the instrument does not engage any of the applicable human rights or freedoms.

The Committee has also commented on the risk that if the penalty were considered 'criminal' in nature for the purposes of international human rights law, the instrument may engage the right not to be tried and punished twice for an offence due to the operation of section 173 of the Credit Act, which allows criminal proceedings to be started against a person for conduct that has already resulted in a civil penalty being imposed.

The operation of section 173 applies to the operation of the Credit Act more generally, and is not restricted to, or an effect of the legislative instrument itself. The issue was addressed in the drafting of the Credit Act by including substantial protections for individuals. For example, section 174 prevents evidence that has been used in civil proceedings against a natural person being used in subsequent criminal proceedings against the person. This makes it clear that these provisions only allow criminal proceedings to be brought where new evidence comes to light following civil proceedings being started or completed.

I also note that similar provisions are relatively common and can be found in other Commonwealth legislation, as stated in Chapter 11 of the Australian Law Reform Commission's Principled Regulation: Federal Civil and Administrative Penalties in Australia (ALRC Report 95).

I trust this information will be of assistance to you.

Yours sincerely

Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work 2016 and Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work Amendment Instrument 2017

This letter is in response to your letter of 30 November 2017 on behalf of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights (the Committee), concerning the Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work 2016 (the 2016 Code) and the Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work Amendment Instrument 2017 (the Amendment Instrument).

As noted in my previous responses of 3 July 2017 and 5 October 2017 the 2016 Code was issued in December 2016 and was the subject of an Opposition disallowance motion that was defeated in the Senate in August 2017. The 2016 Code sets out the Australian Government's expected standards of conduct for all building contractors and building industry participants that seek to be, or are, involved in Commonwealth funded building work.

The Amendment Instrument amended the 2016 Code to reflect amendments made to subsection 34(2E) of the Building and Construction Industry (Improving Productivity) Act 2016 and to provide additional transitional exemptions to assist building contractors and building industry participants with the transition to compliance with the 2016 Code.

A response to the Committee's request for further advice is enclosed and I trust that this response satisfies the Committee's remaining concerns. I note that both the Code and the Amendment Instrument are no longer open to disallowance.

Yours sincerely

Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work 2016
Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work Amendment Instrument 2017

Please find below responses to each of the requests of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights (the Committee) for further advice contained in Report 12 of 2017.

Content of agreements and prohibited conduct – Right to collectively bargain and right to just and favourable conditions of work

The Committee has invited me to provide further advice in relation to the compatibility of sections 11 and 11A of the Code for the Tendering and Performance of Building Work (the 2016 Code) with the right to collectively bargain in light of recent concerns raised by the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

My previous response of 3 July 2017 explains in detail as to why the requirements in sections 11 and 11A are a reasonable and proportionate measure to achieve the legitimate objective of seeking to ensure that enterprise agreements are not used to limit the ability of code covered entities to manage their business efficiently or restrict productivity improvements in the building and construction industry more generally. I continue to stand by that response.

Prohibiting the display of particular signs and union logos, mottos or indicia – Right to freedom of expression, right to freedom of association and right to form and join trade unions

The Committee has sought my advice as to whether there are ‘less rights restrictive approaches’ than those in paragraphs 13(2)(b), (c) and (j) of the 2016 Code to achieve the stated objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose not to join a union.

In my responses to the Committee on 3 July 2017 and 5 October 2017 I outlined extensive material regarding the coercive culture that exists within the building and construction industry in which it is understood that there is such a thing as a ‘union site’ and on those sites all workers are expected to be members of a building association, whether voluntary or not. This included (but was not limited to) a number of findings by courts. Further decisions have been handed down since my last response of 5 October 2017 in which the Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (CFMEU) has repeatedly engaged in conduct that reinforces the coercive culture that an individual must be a union member:

- In October 2017 the Federal Court found the CFMEU in 2015 through its delegate, engaged in adverse action when that delegate prevented a subcontractor’s employee from working on site because he was not a union member and prevented the same employee from performing work on site with intent to coerce him to become a union member. The CFMEU also engaged in coercion when the delegate insisted a second employee of the subcontractor pay fees to join the CFMEU. In imposing fines of $90,000 on the CFMEU and $8,000 on the delegate, Justice Tracey stated that ...the Commissioner has identified 15 cases, since 2000, in which the CFMEU and its officials have been found to have contravened the Act and its predecessors by engaging in misconduct with a view to maintaining “no ticket no start” regimes’ ... and that the delegate ‘arrogated to himself the right to determine who would and would not work on the site in order to advance the ‘no ticket no start’ regime ...’. Justice Tracey also observed that the CFMEU did not provide any assurance that ‘it will direct its shop stewards not to seek to enforce “no ticket, no start” regimes and to respect the freedom of association provisions ...’ (Australian Building and Construction Commissioner v Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (Werribee Shopping Centre Case) [2017] FCA 1235).
- In November 2017, the Federal Court found a CFMEU shop steward in 2014 knowingly made false representations when, upon learning two employees of a subcontractor were non-paying CFMEU members, told the first employee ‘You need to fix it. I can’t let you work if you’re not paid up’ and the second ‘...you can’t work in here...This job is a union site’. The court also found that in making the false representation and refusing the first employee to work on site a few days later, the shop steward engaged in coercion and adverse action against that employee. His Honour also found the CFMEU to be vicariously liable for the actions of the shop steward. The Court is yet to consider the matter of penalties against the shop steward and the CFMEU (Australian Building and Construction Commission v Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (The Quest Apartments Case) [2017] FCA 1398).

The Committee has asserted the provisions are an overbroad limitation on freedoms of expression and association in protecting an individual's right to choose not to join a union. The Committee must however consider the context in which these provisions were introduced and operate. As can be seen from the many decisions of the courts, the CFMEU had promoted, and continues to persistently promote, a coercive culture in which a person cannot engage in a day's work if they are not a union member.

As was set out in my previous responses alternative approaches to address and challenge the custom and practice ingrained in the industry such as education and better mentoring and enforcement have been employed by the Australian Building and Construction Commission and its predecessors. It would be preferable if such approaches on their own were capable of making a difference to the ingrained practice. However, as I concluded in my response of 5 October 2017, it is clear that these approaches alone have not been sufficient (and in my view will continue not be sufficient in the immediate future) to bring about the culture change required to protect the right of individuals to choose whether or not to join a union.

It is in the context of a persistent coercive culture that has not responded to more traditional approaches to protecting freedom of association that the provisions in section 13 are necessary and proportionate. As I have stated in the previous responses, these provisions do not seek to eliminate all forms of expression in relation to union membership. Posters merely encouraging or conveying the benefits of union membership are not prohibited and an individual can display logos on their own personal clothing. The provisions are intended to eliminate visual cues that serve to reinforce the idea of 'union sites'; that is, signs that are directed at harassing or vilifying an individual on the basis of their participation or non-participation in industrial activities; 'no ticket, no start' signs; and union logos, mottos or indicia on employer clothing, property or equipment.

An individual can still seek to express their genuinely held views about industrial action without necessarily making an individual feel coerced into joining or not joining an association. As such it cannot in my view be asserted, as the Committee has done, that the 'limitation on freedom of expression is extensive'. With respect, the Committee's characterisation of the issue, that prohibiting 'insulting language or communication' for the purpose of achieving the stated objective still constitutes a limitation on the right to freedom of expression, trivialises a very real issue for those actually in the building and construction workforce.

The provisions are in my view absolutely essential in addressing the persuasive culture in the building and construction industry and achieving the objective of protecting the ability of individuals to choose to join or not to join a union.

Dear ~~Mr Goodenough~~

Thank you for your letter of 6 December 2017 regarding the Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Bill 2017 (the Commonwealth Bill) and the Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse (Consequential Amendments) Bill 2017. I appreciate the time you have taken to bring this matter to my attention. My response in relation to the human rights compatibility of the legislation is enclosed.

On balance, the Australian Government views this Bill as having appropriate safeguards in place so as to be compatible with human rights, while at the same time achieving the objective of establishing a best practice, supportive redress scheme for survivors.

The Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (the Royal Commission) released its Redress and Civil Litigation Report in 2015 and recommended the establishment of a national redress scheme for survivors. The Royal Commission has highlighted that many survivors of institutional child sexual abuse have not had the opportunity to seek compensation for their injuries that many Australians generally take for granted because of the nature and impact of the abuse they suffered. There is a clear need to provide avenues for survivors to obtain effective redress for this past abuse, but for many, it is no longer feasible to seek common law damages.

The Commonwealth Bill is a significant first step to encourage jurisdictions to opt in to the Scheme, and will ensure survivors who were sexually abused as children in Commonwealth institutions will receive redress. Given the Commonwealth's constitutional limitations, the Commonwealth Bill, which I introduced to Parliament on 26 October 2017, does not facilitate states, or non-government institutions in states, to opt in to the Scheme.

Therefore, if a state agrees to provide a referral of power to participate in the Scheme from its commencement, I will replace the Commonwealth Bill with a National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Bill 2017 (the National Bill), prior to the former's enactment.

The Royal Commission has shed light on the issue of institutional child sexual abuse on a national level, but the scale of this Scheme is quite different from other state-based schemes or overseas experiences (for example, the Irish Redress Scheme only included one institution). For this reason, this Scheme will need to be flexible to account for unforeseen numbers of survivors, institutional contexts and other circumstances. Further, my experience of the Western Australian Redress Scheme has shown that it will be necessary to adjust policy settings to mitigate against unintended outcomes.

Thank you again for raising these matters with me.

Yours sincerely

Response to the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights on:

- the Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Bill 2017; and
- the Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse (Consequential Amendments) Bill 2017

The Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Royal Commission) Redress and Civil Litigation Report has formed the basis for the development of the Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Bill 2017 (Commonwealth Bill). Further, an Independent Advisory Council on Redress, appointed by the Prime Minister, the Hon Malcolm Turnbull MP, provided expert advice and insight into the policy and implementation considerations for the Commonwealth Bill. The Independent Advisory Council includes survivors of institutional child sexual abuse and representatives from support organisations, as well as legal and psychological experts, Indigenous and disability experts, institutional interest groups and those with a background in government. The Council is chaired by the Hon Cheryl Edwardes AM, a former solicitor and Western Australian Attorney-General.

The Commonwealth Bill acknowledges that child sexual abuse suffered by children in institutional settings was wrong and should not have happened. The Royal Commission highlighted the complex needs and different life outcomes of survivors of institutional child sexual abuse. The Commonwealth Bill is designed to recognise the suffering survivors have experienced, accept these events occurred and ensure that each institution that is responsible for the abuse pays redress to survivors.

The Commonwealth Redress Scheme for Survivors of Institutional Child Sexual Abuse (the Scheme), which implements all aspects of the Commonwealth Bill, is designed to be responsive to survivors' and participating institutions' needs.

The Royal Commission recommended the establishment of a national redress scheme for survivors. In circumstances where the Commonwealth does not have comprehensive constitutional power to legislate for a national Scheme, a referral to the Commonwealth from the states under section 51(xxxvii) of the Constitution is the most legally sound way to implement a nationally consistent Scheme and maximise participation. It will enable redress to be provided to survivors of institutional child sexual abuse in non-government institutions that occurred in a state or where a state government is deemed responsible.

The Commonwealth Bill is a significant first step to encourage jurisdictions to opt-in to the Scheme, and has been designed in anticipation of their participation should a referral of powers be received.

Eligibility to receive redress under the Commonwealth Redress Scheme

1.18 The preceding analysis indicates that the right to equality and non-discrimination on the basis of nationality or national origin is engaged and limited by the bill. This is because a person will only be eligible for the scheme if they are an

Australian citizen or Australian permanent resident notwithstanding that the right to an effective remedy for a violation of human rights applies regardless of citizenship or residency status.

1.19 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the minister as to:

- whether the restriction on non-citizens' and non-permanent residents' eligibility for redress under the scheme is aimed at achieving a legitimate objective for the purposes of human rights law (including any information or evidence to explain why the measure addresses a pressing and substantial concern);
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) that objective; and
- whether the restriction on non-citizens' and non-permanent residents' eligibility for the scheme is proportionate to achieve the stated objective (including whether there are less rights restrictive means available to achieve the stated objective).

I note the committee seeks further information on the importance of the objective of ensuring the integrity of the Scheme, in the context of the measure to limit eligibility of non-citizens and non-permanent residents. As stated in the opening remarks of this response, participation in the Scheme is necessarily voluntary. To ensure maximum participation, and therefore maximise the opportunity for survivors to seek redress, it is vitally important that participating institutions and institutions considering participating (together, most importantly, with survivors) are confident the Scheme provides the appropriate architecture to support its integrity and legitimacy.

A core principle of the Scheme is to ensure redress is paid to those who are eligible. It is important that the Scheme can identify and verify the identity of those making a claim. The Scheme is also designed to be an alternative to civil litigation where many survivors cannot seek redress due to the period of time that has lapsed since the incident, or do not have enough evidence to pursue a claim via the courts.

Given the comparative size of the monetary payments under the Scheme and the relatively low evidentiary burden that will be required of survivors making applications, the risk of fraud is a key concern. Verification of proof of identity is one means by which the Scheme can limit attempted fraud. Opening eligibility to non-citizens and non-permanent residents would significantly increase the difficulty of proof of identity verification for those applicants and increase overall processing times of applications. Verification of identity of those who are non-citizens and non-permanent residents would require primary documentation and verification from foreign governments and Australian embassies.

As I outlined in the statement of compatibility with human rights for the Scheme's legislation, large volumes of false claims from organised overseas groups could overwhelm the Scheme's resources and delay the processing of legitimate applications. In this regard, the Commonwealth Government is continually undertaking fraud detection work to ensure the integrity of social security payments and there is evidence of organised crime attempting to defraud the Commonwealth. However, providing evidence of this nature to the committee may compromise fraud detection activities.

Further, I note the committee's view that reducing administrative burden is insufficient for the permissible limitation of human rights, however I would emphasise that the nature of the survivor cohort is such that timeliness in processing Scheme applications is critical. Over half of the survivors anticipated to apply to the Scheme are over the age of 50, and so significant delays to the processing of applications may result in survivors passing away before they have the opportunity to apply for or accept redress. It is widely recognised that survivors of child sexual abuse also experience poorer health and social outcomes, amplifying the need for timely decision-making and for promoting the rights of survivors.

It is important that our policy settings support the integrity and appropriate targeting of payments. Should the Scheme not safeguard against potential fraud, institutions may choose not to participate, or may seek to leave the Scheme.

When determining the proportionality of the measure, the committee has noted that the Explanatory Memorandum details three initial classes of people that will be eligible for redress, despite the citizenship requirements contained in the Bill. It is necessary for these classes of eligibility to be contained in a separate legislative instrument as further investigation and consultation is continuing across Government and with states and territories to determine if there are other classes of survivors that do not fit the above citizenship requirements that should be deemed eligible for the Scheme. While examples have been provided in the Explanatory Memorandum, these are still being investigated.

There may also be classes of survivors that will apply for redress that the Scheme has not, or could not, envisage including in the legislation. The Scheme may not have accounted for categories of survivors that it needs to deal with promptly, to ensure the timely processing of applications and the best outcomes for survivors so subclause 16(2) of the Commonwealth Bill is necessary to allow the Scheme to respond to situations as they arise. Additionally, subclause 16(3) will be used to respond to exceptional cases, such as to specify people ineligible where they have a criminal conviction and their eligibility would affect the integrity and public confidence in the Scheme.

Restricting the eligibility of non-citizens and non-permanent residents is necessary to achieve the legitimate aims of ensuring that survivors are provided the redress to which they are entitled in a timely manner, and that redress is provided only to those who submit genuine claims. Subsection 16(2) of the Commonwealth Bill will allow discretion to deem categories of survivors eligible despite these restrictions, such as child migrants. This ensures that the limitation of survivors' rights is proportionate.

I am considering the committee's suggestion to include these predetermined cases in primary legislation in the context of any future legislation developed to reflect a national redress Scheme.

1.26 The preceding analysis indicates that the right to an effective remedy may be engaged by the powers under the bill to determine eligibility and ineligibility for the scheme for the scheme by way of the proposed Commonwealth Redress Scheme Rules. This is because the broad rule-making power to determine eligibility or ineligibility may be exercised in a way that is compatible with this right.

1.27 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the minister as to:

- Whether the power to determine eligibility or ineligibility in the proposed rules is aimed at achieving a legitimate objective for the purposes of human rights law;
- How the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) that objective; and
- Whether the limitation is proportionate to achieve the stated objective (including whether there are less rights restrictive means available to achieve the stated objective).

The Scheme is designed to be responsive to survivors' and participating institutions' needs. Flexibility is needed to allow adjustments for the differing needs of survivors, participating institutions, and to enable the Scheme to quickly implement changes required to ensure positive outcomes for survivors. This is why it is necessary for elements of the Scheme to be in delegated legislation.

Using rules, rather than regulations or incorporating all elements of the Scheme in the Commonwealth Bill, provides appropriate flexibility and enables the Scheme to respond to factual matters as they arise. It is uncertain how many applications for redress the Scheme will receive at its commencement, and whether there will be unforeseen issues requiring prompt responses. It is therefore appropriate that aspects of the Scheme be covered by rules that can be adapted and modified in a timely manner. The need to respond quickly to survivor needs is also a key feature of the Scheme as many survivors have waited decades for recognition and justice.

The committee has noted foreshadowed exclusions of certain persons from being eligible to the Scheme if they have been convicted of sex offences, or sentenced to prison terms of five years or more for crimes such as serious drug, homicide or fraud offences.

As the committee rightly highlights, this significant matter should not be delegated to subordinate legislation. The limitation on eligibility for persons with criminal convictions will therefore be included in the primary legislation of the proposed National Bill. There could be a perception that the Commonwealth Bill limits the rights to effective remedy for survivors with criminal convictions. However, the decision was made that in order to give integrity and public confidence to the Scheme, there had to be some limitations for applications from people who themselves had committed serious offences, but particularly sexual offences.

The eligibility policy has been developed in consultation with State and Territory Attorneys-General, who were almost unanimous in their view that reasonable limitations on applications is necessary to have public faith and confidence in the Scheme. Excluding some people based on serious criminal offences is necessary to ensure taxpayer money is not used to pay redress to those who may not meet prevailing community standards.

However, the Scheme Operator will have discretion at subsections 16(2) and (3) of the Commonwealth Bill to determine the eligibility of survivors applying for redress on a case-by-case basis, including survivors who are currently, or have been, incarcerated. Importantly, the Scheme Operator can use this discretion to deem a person eligible for redress if they are otherwise ineligible due to the criminal convictions exclusions. In considering whether to exercise discretion, the Scheme Operator will consider the nature of the crime committed, the duration of the sentence and broader public interest issues. The Scheme Operator discretion is also intended to mitigate the impact of jurisdictional differences in crimes legislation. For example, mandatory minimum sentences for certain offences may lead to some applicants receiving longer sentences than they would in other jurisdictions, and perhaps making them ineligible for the Scheme.

It is appropriate for such matters to be included in rules as the Scheme needs to be responsive to survivors, participating State and Territory institutions, and participating non-government institutions given that the Scheme will operate for a fixed period of time and needs to ensure the timely processing of survivors' applications.

All aspects of the Scheme have been subject to ongoing consultation with State and Territory Ministers responsible for redress, state and territory departmental officials, the Independent Advisory Council, survivors of institutional child sexual abuse and non-government institutions. The drafting of the legislation, including the rules, have been a part of this consultation with stakeholders.

A Board of Governance will be established to serve in an advisory capacity to provide advice to the Minister, Scheme Operator, the Department of Social Services and the Department of Human Services. The Board's membership will be made up of Ministerial representatives from each participating State and Territory and consultation and agreement from the Board will be undertaken prior to any legislative changes, including creating or amending legislative instruments.

Power to determine when a participating institution is not responsible for sexual or non-sexual abuse

1.32 The preceding analysis indicates that the right to an effective remedy may be engaged by the powers under the bill to determine by way of the proposed Commonwealth Redress Scheme Rules when a participating institution is not responsible for sexual abuse or non-sexual abuse.

1.33 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the minister as to:

- whether the measure is aimed at achieving a legitimate objective for the purposes of human rights law;
- how the measure is effective to achieve (that is, rationally connected to) that objective; and
- whether the limitation is proportionate to achieve the stated objective (including whether there are less rights restrictive means available to achieve the stated objective).

As the Committee has noted, subclause 21(7) of the Commonwealth Bill is intended to operate to ensure that participating institutions are not found responsible for abuse that occurred in circumstances where it would be unreasonable to hold the institution responsible.

The power in subclause 21(7) will also be used to clarify circumstances where a participating government institution should not be considered responsible. Such circumstances may include:

- where the government only had a regulatory role over a non-government institution;

- where the government only provided funding to a non-government institution; and
- where the only connection is that the non-government institution was established under law enacted by the government.

Until institutions opt in to the Scheme, it is not possible to envisage every possible circumstance to include in the legislation. These rulemaking provisions allow the Scheme to be responsive to the realities of implementation, which is necessary to achieve the legitimate aim of public and institutional support for the Scheme. Were the Scheme too fixed in its methodology, the Scheme may face criticism for reaching unreasonable decisions.

Bar on future civil liability of participating institutions

1.41 The preceding analysis raises questions as to whether requiring persons who are eligible for redress to release and discharge institutions participating in the scheme from future civil liability for abuse of the person is a proportionate limitation on the right to an effective remedy.

1.42 The committee therefore seeks the advice of the minister as to the proportionality of the measure, in particular the content of the proposed rules relating to the provision of legal services under the scheme.

As the Committee has noted, maximising the redress for survivors is a legitimate objective for the purposes of international human rights law. Therefore, releasing institutions from further liability following their involvement in the redress process under the Scheme is a proportionate measure to achieve the objective of ensuring institutions opt into the Scheme.

The measure is supported by proportionate and essential safeguards for survivors through the provision of a free community-based legal service to ensure survivors understand the legal implications of signing a release. The free community-based legal service will be available to survivors at the commencement of their engagement with the Scheme. The website, helpline and other engagement documents will make it clear to survivors that a release will be required in order to receive redress under the Scheme. The Scheme will make available legal advice during this process so that survivors understand the legal implications.

The Rules will include a provision which provides funding for legal services for the purposes of a person receiving trauma informed, culturally appropriate and expert legal advice as required throughout the Scheme.

Legal services will be available during the four key stages of the redress application process:

1. prior to application so survivors understand eligibility requirements and the application process of the Scheme;
2. during completion of a survivor's application;
3. after a survivor has received an offer of redress (including if they elect to seek an internal review); and

4. on the effect of signing a Deed of Release (DoR), including its impact on the prospect of future litigation.

Survivors will be able to obtain free legal assistance on an ongoing basis as required across each of the above four stages.

The Rules will also include a provision that allows a person who cannot access the funded legal service because of a conflict of interest, to be referred to another legal firm and have their legal costs covered by the Scheme's legal services provider.

In relation to the release, legal support could include:

- providing an explanation of the factors which make up the offer survivors have received and the matters considered by the assessment team;
- identifying the potential rights that the survivor is releasing; and
- helping the survivor decide whether they wish to accept the offer or not.

Information Sharing Provisions

1.52 The preceding analysis raises questions as to whether the compatibility of the proposed disclosure powers of the Operator in proposed section 77 of the bill is a proportionate limitation on the right to privacy.

1.53 The committee seeks the advice of the minister as to whether the limitation on the right to privacy is proportionate to the stated objective of the measure (including whether there are adequate safeguards in place in relation to disclosure by the Operator of protected information).

Section 77 of the Commonwealth Bill has been drafted to reflect similar provisions in other legislation within the Social Services portfolio, which routinely deals with a person's sensitive information and provides a consistent approach to the way in which the Department deals with protected information. It was considered appropriate to provide a power to enable rules to be made by the Minister if it was considered necessary to assist with the exercise of the Scheme Operator's disclosure of protected information. This provides flexibility to address any circumstances that arise which are of sufficient public interest to warrant the exercise of that power. Incorporating high-level rules in the Commonwealth Bill would restrict the Scheme Operator's power to make a public interest disclosure to those circumstances set out in the Commonwealth Bill.

Careful consideration will be given to ensure that any personal information held by the Scheme Operator is given due and proper protection. It is envisaged the power to make public interest disclosures will only be used where it is necessary to prevent, or lessen, a threat to life, health or welfare, for the purpose of briefing the Minister or if the information is necessary to assist a court, coronial inquiry, Royal Commission, or similar, for specific purposes such as a reported missing person or a homeless person. These criteria are some of those that are already outlined in other legislation in the Social Services portfolio that govern public interest certificates, such as the Social Security (Public Interest Certificate Guidelines) (DSS) Determination 2015 and the Paid Parental Leave Rules 2010.

Despite there not being a positive requirement in the Commonwealth Bill, the intention is to make rules to regulate the Scheme Operator's disclosure power to ensure that the limitation on the right to privacy is proportionate to achieve the various legitimate aims of public interest disclosures. However, the Committee's concerns are noted and I will consider including a positive requirement for rules in the National Bill, including a requirement that the Scheme Operator must have regard to the impact the disclosure may have on a person to whom the information relates.

Absence of external merits review and removal of judicial review

1.62 The preceding analysis indicates that the right to a fair hearing may be engaged by the absence of external merits review of determinations made under the scheme, and the removal of judicial review.

1.63 The committee seeks the advice of the minister as to the compatibility of the measure with the right to a fair hearing, including:

- whether the absence of external merits review and removal of judicial review pursues a legitimate objective;
- whether the measures are rationally connected to (that is, effective to achieve) that objective;
- whether the measures are a proportionate means of achieving the stated objective.

The decision to exclude external merits review for applicants was made on the advice of the Independent Advisory Council on Redress and following the Royal Commission's recommendation on this matter. The Council recommended the Scheme provide survivors with access to an internal review process, but no access to external merits or judicial review as it considered that providing survivors with external review would be overly legalistic, time consuming, expensive and would risk further harm to survivors. If judicial review avenues were available, many survivors may have unrealistic expectations of what could be achieved given the low evidentiary barrier to entry to the Scheme compared to civil litigation, and that therefore the judicial review process is likely to re-traumatise a survivor.

The Department of Social Services will recruit appropriately qualified, independent assessors, known as Independent Decision Makers, who will make all decisions on applications made to the Scheme. Independent Decision Makers will not report or be answerable to Government. These Independent Decision Makers will be able to provide survivors with access to independent and impartial review without subjecting them to potential re-traumatisation.

Members of the Administrative Appeals Tribunal are appointed based on their judicial experience, not recruited for the skillset and understanding of the survivor cohort that will be required of Independent Decision Makers. The Administrative Appeals Tribunal must make a legally correct or preferable decision, while Independent Decision Makers will make decisions on applications with highly variable levels of detail and without strict legislative guidance on what weight should be applied to the information they do receive. Without an understanding of past decisions under the Scheme, the Tribunal may reach decisions that are inconsistent with past decisions made by Independent Decision Makers. Utilising the Administrative Appeals Tribunal for merits review under the Scheme risks inappropriately imposing a legalistic lens on a non-legalistic decision making process.

Dear Mr Goodenough

This letter is in response to an email of 5 February 2018 from the Committee Secretary, Ms Toni Dawes, to the Senior Adviser to Senator the Hon Michaelia Cash, Minister for Jobs and Innovation, concerning the Fair Work Laws Amendment (Proper Use of Worker Benefits) Bill 2017. As the issues raised fall within my portfolio responsibilities as Minister for Small and Family Business, the Workplace and Deregulation, your email was referred to me for reply.

I understand that the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights seeks further information as to whether the proposed prohibition on terms of industrial instruments requiring or permitting payments to worker entitlement funds in the Bill is compatible with the right to collectively bargain, with particular reference to findings by relevant international supervisory mechanisms.

My detailed response to the Committee's enquiry is attached.

Yours sincerely

FAIR WORK LAWS AMENDMENT (PROPER USE OF WORKER BENEFITS) BILL 2017

Compatibility with the right to collectively bargain

Prohibiting terms of industrial agreements requiring or permitting payments to worker entitlement funds

The Committee has sought further information, asking:

- whether the proposed prohibition is compatible with the right to collectively bargain, with particular reference to findings by relevant international supervisory mechanisms.

A detailed response to issues raised in Human Rights Scrutiny Report No.12 of 2017 in relation to the Bill was provided to the Committee by the office of Senator the Hon Michaelia Cash, then Minister for Employment, on 19 December 2017. That response addressed the proposed prohibition on industrial instruments requiring or permitting payments to unregistered worker entitlement funds, noting that while the prohibition engages the right to collectively bargain, it does so in a manner that is reasonable and proportionate and enhances workers' rights.

The Bill prohibits terms in industrial agreements that require or permit payments only to unregistered worker entitlement funds. Registered worker entitlement funds will be required to comply with basic governance and disclosure requirements. The prohibition on payments to unregistered worker entitlement funds is simply a mechanism to ensure that such funds are properly regulated, subject to appropriate minimum governance requirements and comply with laws similar to those that apply to other managed investment schemes.

Findings from two Royal Commissions have emphasised the importance of properly regulating worker entitlement funds, particularly given the significant sums of money held by these funds for the benefit of workers, and the consequences that would follow if a fund was to fail.

Most recently, the 2016 report of the Royal Commission into Trade Union Governance and Corruption (2016 Royal Commission) recommended that legislation be enacted dealing comprehensively with the minimum governance, financial reporting and financial disclosures for worker entitlement funds. This Bill implements that recommendation.

As noted in the previous response of 19 December 2017, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) has stated that 'Restrictions on [the] principle [of leaving the greatest possible autonomy to organizations in their functioning and administration] should have the sole objective of protecting the interests of members'.<sup>1</sup> It is considered that the 'functioning' of organisations includes their ability to collectively bargain, such that any restriction on collective bargaining should have the sole objective of protecting the interests of members.

A prohibition on industrial instruments requiring or permitting payments to unregistered worker entitlement funds is intended to protect the interests of members of organisations by ensuring that such payments may only be made to worker entitlement funds that are registered. A worker entitlement fund can be registered provided it meets basic governance and disclosure requirements. These requirements are designed to address potential conflicts of interest, breaches of fiduciary duty and coercive conduct. The provisions in the Bill ensure that money held by worker entitlement funds is used to benefit workers. The amendments will provide members with a guarantee that any contributions made to a worker entitlement fund is subject to appropriate scrutiny and oversight.

In addition, the ILO considers that there are some exceptions to the general rule that measures taken to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are generally considered to be incompatible with international labour standards. These include 'the prohibition of certain subjects for reasons of public order'.<sup>2</sup> Further, Article 4 of the ILO Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention 1949 (No. 98) specifies that the machinery for voluntary negotiation of terms and conditions of employment should be 'appropriate to national conditions'.

Given that the prohibition supports the basic governance and disclosure requirements of the Bill that are intended to address potential conflicts of interest, breaches of fiduciary duty and potential for coercive conduct outlined in the 2016 Royal Commission, in addition to protecting the interests of workers and supporting public order, it is appropriate to Australian conditions and so is permissible.

GUIDANCE NOTE 1: Drafting statements of compatibility

December 2014

This note sets out the committee's approach to human rights assessments and its requirements for statements of compatibility. It is designed to assist legislation proponents in the preparation of statements of compatibility.

Background

Australia's human rights obligations

Human rights are defined in the Human Rights (Parliamentary Scrutiny) Act 2011 as the rights and freedoms contained in the seven core human rights treaties to which Australia is a party. These treaties are:

- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights
- International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination
- Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women
- Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment
- Convention on the Rights of the Child
- Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities

Australia has voluntarily accepted obligations under these seven core UN human rights treaties. Under international law it is the state that has an obligation to ensure that all persons enjoy human rights. Australia's obligations under international human rights law are threefold:

- to respect – requiring government not to interfere with or limit human rights;
- to protect – requiring government to take measures to prevent others (for example individuals or corporations) from interfering with human rights;
- to fulfil – requiring government to take positive measures to fully realise human rights.

Where a person's rights have been breached, there is an obligation to ensure accessible and effective remedies are available to that person.

Australia's human rights obligations apply to all people subject to Australia's jurisdiction, regardless of whether they are Australian citizens. This means Australia owes human rights obligations to everyone in Australia, as well as to persons outside Australia where Australia is exercising effective control over them, or they are otherwise under Australia's jurisdiction.

The treaties confer rights on individuals and groups of individuals and not companies or other incorporated bodies.

Civil and political rights

Australia is under an obligation to respect, protect and fulfil its obligations in relation to all civil and political rights. It is generally accepted that most civil and political rights are capable of immediate realisation.

Economic, social and cultural rights

Australia is also under an obligation to respect, protect and fulfil economic, social and cultural rights. However, there is some flexibility allowed in the implementation of these rights. This is the obligation of progressive realisation, which recognises that the full realisation of economic, social and cultural rights may be achieved progressively. Nevertheless, there are some obligations in relation to economic, social and cultural rights which have immediate effect. These include the obligation to ensure that people enjoy economic, social and cultural rights without discrimination.

Limiting a human right

It is a general principle of international human rights law that the rights protected by the human rights treaties are to be interpreted generously and limitations narrowly. Nevertheless, international human rights law recognises that reasonable limits may be placed on most rights and freedoms – there are very few absolute rights which can never be legitimately limited.<sup>1</sup> For all other rights, rights may be limited as long as the limitation meets certain standards. In general, any measure that limits a human right has to comply with the following criteria (The limitation criteria) in order for the limitation to be considered justifiable.

Prescribed by law

Any limitation on a right must have a clear legal basis. This requires not only that the measure limiting the right be set out in legislation (or be permitted under an established rule of the common law); it must also be accessible and precise enough so that people know the legal consequences of their actions or the circumstances under which authorities may restrict the exercise of their rights.

Legitimate objective

Any limitation on a right must be shown to be necessary in pursuit of a legitimate objective. To demonstrate that a limitation is permissible, proponents of legislation must provide reasoned and evidence-based explanations of the legitimate objective being pursued. To be capable of justifying a proposed limitation on human rights, a legitimate objective must address a pressing or substantial concern, and not simply seek an outcome regarded as desirable or convenient. In addition, there are a number of rights that may only be limited for a number of prescribed purposes.<sup>2</sup>

Rational connection

It must also be demonstrated that any limitation on a right has a rational connection to the objective to be achieved. To demonstrate that a limitation is permissible, proponents of legislation must provide reasoned and evidence-based explanations as to how the measures are likely to be effective in achieving the objective being sought.

Proportionality

To demonstrate that a limitation is permissible, the limitation must be proportionate to the objective being sought. In considering whether a limitation on a right might be proportionate, key factors include:

- whether there are other less restrictive ways to achieve the same aim;
- whether there are effective safeguards or controls over the measures, including the possibility of monitoring and access to review;

<sup>2</sup> For example, the right to association. For more detailed information on individual rights see Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, Guide to Human Rights (March 2014), available at <http://www.aprh.gov.au/~media/Committees/Joint/PJCHR/Guide%20to%20Human%20Rights.pdf>.

- the extent of any interference with human rights – the greater the interference the less likely it is to be considered proportionate;
- whether affected groups are particularly vulnerable; and
- whether the measure provides sufficient flexibility to treat different cases differently or whether it imposes a blanket policy without regard to the merits of an individual case.

Retrogressive measures

In respect of economic, social and cultural rights, as there is a duty to realise rights progressively there is also a corresponding duty to refrain from taking retrogressive measures. This means that the state cannot unjustifiably take deliberate steps backwards which negatively affect the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights. In assessing whether a retrogressive measure is justified the limitation criteria are a useful starting point.

The committee's approach to human rights scrutiny

The committee's mandate to examine all existing and proposed Commonwealth legislation for compatibility with Australia's human rights obligations, seeks to ensure that human rights are taken into account in the legislative process.

The committee views its human rights scrutiny tasks as primarily preventive in nature and directed at minimising risks of new legislation giving rise to breaches of human rights in practice. The committee also considers it has an educative role, which includes raising awareness of legislation that promotes human rights.

The committee considers that, where relevant and appropriate, the views of human rights treaty bodies and international and comparative human rights jurisprudence can be useful sources for understanding the nature and scope of the human rights referred to in the Human Rights (Parliamentary Scrutiny) Act 2011. Similarly, there are a number of other treaties and instruments to which Australia is a party, such as the International Labour Organization (ILO) Conventions and the Refugee Convention which, although not listed in the Human Rights (Parliamentary Scrutiny) Act 2011, may nonetheless be relevant to the interpretation of the human rights protected by the seven core human rights treaties. The committee has also referred to other non-treaty instruments, such as the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, where it considers that these are relevant to the interpretation of the human rights in the seven treaties that fall within its mandate. When the committee relies on regional or comparative jurisprudence to support its analysis of the rights in the treaties, it will acknowledge this where necessary.

The committee's expectations for statements of compatibility

The committee considers statements of compatibility as essential to the examination of human rights in the legislative process. The committee expects statements to read as stand-alone documents. The committee relies on the statement as the primary document that sets out the legislation proponent's analysis of the compatibility of the bill or instrument with Australia's international human rights obligations.

While there is no prescribed form for statements under the Human Rights (Parliamentary Scrutiny) Act 2011, the committee strongly recommends legislation proponents use the current templates provided by the Attorney-General's Department.<sup>3</sup>

The statement of compatibility should identify the rights engaged by the legislation. Not every possible right engaged needs to be identified in the statement of compatibility, only those that are substantially engaged. The committee does not expect analysis of rights consequentially or tangentially engaged in a minor way.

Consistent with the approach set out in the guidance materials developed by the Attorney-General's department, where a bill or instrument limits a human right, the committee requires that the statement of compatibility provide a detailed and evidence-based assessment of the measures against the limitation criteria set out in this note. Statements of compatibility should provide analysis of the impact of the bill or instrument on vulnerable groups.

Where the committee's analysis suggests that a bill limits a right and the statement of compatibility does not include a reasoned and evidence-based assessment, the committee may seek additional/further information from the proponent of the legislation. Where further information is not provided and/or is inadequate, the committee will conclude its assessment based on its original analysis. This may include a conclusion that the bill or instrument (or specific measures within a bill or instrument) are incompatible with Australia's international human rights obligations.

This approach is consistent with international human rights law which requires that any limitation on a human right be justified as reasonable, necessary and proportionate in pursuit of a legitimate objective.

GUIDANCE NOTE 2: Offence provisions, civil penalties and human rights

This guidance note sets out some of the key human rights compatibility issues in relation to provisions that create offences and civil penalties. It is not intended to be exhaustive but to provide guidance on the committee's approach and expectations in relation to assessing the human rights compatibility of such provisions.

Introduction

The right to a fair trial and fair hearing are protected by article 14(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). The right to a fair trial and fair hearing applies to both criminal and civil proceedings.

A range of protections are afforded to persons accused and convicted of criminal offences under article 14. These include the presumption of innocence (article 14(2)), the right to not incriminate oneself (article 14(3)(g)), the right to have a sentence reviewed by a higher tribunal (article 14(5)), the right not to be tried or punished twice for the same offence (article 14(7)), a guarantee against retrospective criminal laws (article 15(1)) and the right not to be arbitrarily detained (article 9(1)).<sup>1</sup>

Offence provisions need to be considered and assessed in the context of these standards. Where a criminal offence provision is introduced or amended, the statement of compatibility for the legislation will usually need to provide an assessment of whether human rights are engaged and limited.<sup>2</sup>

The Guide to Framing Commonwealth Offences, Infringement Notices and Enforcement Powers provides a range of guidance in relation to the framing of offence provisions.<sup>3</sup> However, legislation proponents should note that this government guide is neither binding nor conclusive of issues of human rights compatibility. The discussion below is intended to assist legislation proponents to identify matters that are likely to be relevant to the framing of offence provisions and the assessment of their human rights compatibility.

Reverse burden offences

Article 14(2) of the ICCPR protects the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law. Generally, consistency with the presumption of innocence requires the prosecution to prove each element of a criminal offence beyond reasonable doubt.

An offence provision which requires the defendant to carry an evidential or legal burden of proof, commonly referred to as 'a reverse burden', with regard to the existence of some fact engages and limits the presumption of innocence. This is because a defendant's failure to discharge the burden of proof may permit their conviction despite reasonable doubt as to their guilt. Where a statutory exception, defence or excuse to an offence is provided in proposed legislation, these defences or exceptions must be considered as part of a contextual and substantive assessment of potential limitations on the right to be presumed innocent in the context of an offence provision.

Reverse burden offences will be likely to be compatible with the presumption of innocence where they are shown by legislation proponents to be reasonable, necessary and proportionate in pursuit of a legitimate objective. Claims of greater convenience or ease for the prosecution in proving a case will be insufficient, in and of themselves, to justify a limitation on the defendant's right to be presumed innocent.

It is the committee's usual expectation that, where a reverse burden offence is introduced, legislation proponents provide a human rights assessment in the statement of compatibility, in accordance with Guidance Note 1.

Strict liability and absolute liability offences

Strict liability and absolute liability offences engage and limit the presumption of innocence. This is because they allow for the imposition of criminal liability without the need to prove fault.

The effect of applying strict liability to an element or elements of an offence therefore means that the prosecution does not need to prove fault. However, the defence of mistake of fact is available to the defendant. Similarly, the effect of applying absolute liability to an element or elements of an offence means that no fault element needs to be proved, but the defence of mistake of fact is not available.

Strict liability and absolute liability offences will not necessarily be inconsistent with the presumption of innocence where they are reasonable, necessary and proportionate in pursuit of a legitimate objective.

The committee notes that strict liability and absolute liability may apply to whole offences or to elements of offences. It is the committee's usual expectation that, where strict liability and absolute liability criminal offences or elements are introduced, legislation proponents should provide a human rights assessment of their compatibility with the presumption of innocence, in accordance with Guidance Note 1.

Mandatory minimum sentencing

Article 9 of the ICCPR protects the right to security of the person and freedom from arbitrary detention. An offence provision which requires mandatory minimum sentencing will engage and limit the right to be free from arbitrary detention. The notion of 'arbitrariness' under international human rights law includes elements of inappropriateness, injustice and lack of predictability. Detention may be considered arbitrary where it is disproportionate to the crime that has been committed (for example, as a result of a blanket policy).<sup>4</sup> Mandatory sentencing may lead to disproportionate or unduly harsh outcomes as it removes judicial discretion to take into account all of the relevant circumstances of a particular case in sentencing.

Mandatory sentencing is also likely to engage and limit article 14(5) of the ICCPR, which protects the right to have a sentence reviewed by a higher tribunal. This is because mandatory sentencing prevents judicial review of the severity or correctness of a minimum sentence.

The committee considers that mandatory minimum sentencing will be difficult to justify as compatible with human rights, given the substantial limitations it places on the right to freedom from arbitrary detention and the right to have a sentence reviewed by a higher tribunal (due to the blanket nature of the measure). Where mandatory minimum sentencing does not require a minimum non-parole period, this will generally be insufficient, in and of itself, to preserve the requisite judicial discretion under international human rights law to take into account the particular circumstances of the offence and the offender.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>4</sup> See, for example, A v Australia (1997) 560/1993, UN Doc. CCPR/C/59/D/560/1993, [9.4]; Concluding Observations on Australia in 2000 (2000) UN doc A/55/40, volume 1, [522] (in relation to mandatory sentencing in the Northern Territory and Western Australia).

Civil penalty provisions

Many bills and existing statutes contain civil penalty provisions. These are generally prohibitions on particular forms of conduct that give rise to liability for a 'civil penalty' enforceable by a court. As these penalties are pecuniary and do not include the possibility of imprisonment, they are said to be 'civil' in nature and do not constitute criminal offences under Australian law.

Given their 'civil' character, applications for a civil penalty order are dealt with in accordance with the rules and procedures that apply in relation to civil matters. These rules and procedures often form part of a regulatory regime which provides for a graduated series of sanctions, including infringement notices, injunctions, enforceable undertakings, civil penalties and criminal offences.

However, civil penalty provisions may engage the criminal process rights under articles 14 and 15 of the ICCPR where the penalty may be regarded as 'criminal' for the purpose of international human rights law. The term 'criminal' has an 'autonomous' meaning in human rights law. In other words, a penalty or other sanction may be 'criminal' for the purposes of the ICCPR even though it is considered to be 'civil' under Australian domestic law.

There is a range of international and comparative jurisprudence on whether a 'civil' penalty is likely to be 'criminal' for the purpose of human rights law.<sup>6</sup> This criteria for assessing whether a penalty is 'criminal' for the purposes of human rights law is set out in further detail on page 4. The following steps (one to three) may assist legislation proponents in understanding whether a provision may be characterised as 'criminal' under international human rights law.

- Step one: Is the penalty classified as criminal under Australian Law?

If so, the penalty will be considered 'criminal' for the purpose of human rights law. If not, proceed to step two.

- Step two: What is the nature and purpose of the penalty?

The penalty is likely to be considered criminal for the purposes of human rights law if:

- a) the purpose of the penalty is to punish or deter; and
- b) the penalty applies to the public in general (rather than being restricted to people in a specific regulatory or disciplinary context.)

If the penalty does not satisfy this test, proceed to step three.

- Step three: What is the severity of the penalty?

The penalty is likely to be considered criminal for the purposes of human rights law if the civil penalty provision carries a penalty of imprisonment or a substantial pecuniary sanction.

Note: even if a penalty is not considered 'criminal' separately under steps two or three, it may still be considered 'criminal' where the nature and severity of the penalty are cumulatively considered.

<sup>5</sup> This is because the mandatory minimum sentence may be seen by courts as a 'sentencing guidepost' which specifies the appropriate penalty for the least serious case. Judges may feel constrained to impose, for example, what is considered the usual proportion for a non-parole period (approximately 2/3 of the head sentence).

<sup>6</sup> The UN Human Rights Committee, while not providing further guidance, has determined that 'civil' penalties may be 'criminal' for the purpose of human rights law, see, for example, Osiyuk v Belarus (1311/04); Sayadi and Vinck v Belgium (1472/06).

When a civil penalty provision is 'criminal'

In light of the criteria described at pages 3-4 above, the committee will have regard to the following matters when assessing whether a particular civil penalty provision is 'criminal' for the purposes of human rights law.

a) Classification of the penalty under domestic law

The committee considers that in accordance with international human rights law, the classification of the penalty as 'civil' under domestic law will not be determinative. However, if the penalty is 'criminal' under domestic law it will also be 'criminal' under international law.

b) The nature of the penalty

The committee considers that a civil penalty provision is more likely to be considered 'criminal' in nature if it contains the following features:

- the penalty is intended to be punitive or deterrent in nature, irrespective of its severity;
- the proceedings are instituted by a public authority with statutory powers of enforcement;
- a finding of culpability precedes the imposition of a penalty; and
- the penalty applies to the public in general instead of being directed at people in a specific regulatory or disciplinary context (the latter being more likely to be viewed as 'disciplinary' or regulatory rather than as 'criminal').

c) The severity of the penalty

In assessing whether a pecuniary penalty is sufficiently severe to amount to a 'criminal' penalty, the committee will have regard to:

- the amount of the pecuniary penalty that may be imposed under the relevant legislation with reference to the regulatory context;
- the nature of the industry or sector being regulated and relative size of the pecuniary penalties and the fines that may be imposed (for example, large penalties may be less likely to be criminal in the corporate context);
- the maximum amount of the pecuniary penalty that may be imposed under the civil penalty provision relative to the penalty that may be imposed for a corresponding criminal offence; and
- whether the pecuniary penalty imposed by the civil penalty provision carries a sanction of imprisonment for non-payment, or other very serious implications for the individual in question.

The consequences of a conclusion that a civil penalty is 'criminal'

If a civil penalty is assessed to be 'criminal' for the purposes of human rights law, this does not mean that it must be turned into a criminal offence in domestic law. Human rights law does not stand in the way of decriminalisation. Instead, it simply means that the civil penalty provision in question must be shown to be consistent with the criminal process guarantees set out in articles 14 and 15 of the ICCPR.

By contrast, if a civil penalty is characterised as not being 'criminal', the specific criminal process guarantees in articles 14 and 15 will not apply. However, such provisions must still comply with the right to a fair hearing before a competent, independent and impartial tribunal contained in article 14(1) of the ICCPR. The Senate Standing Committee for the Scrutiny of Bills may also comment on whether such provisions comply with accountability standards.

As set out in Guidance Note 1, sufficiently detailed statements of compatibility are essential for the effective consideration of the human rights compatibility of bills and legislative instruments. Where a civil penalty provision could potentially be considered 'criminal' the statement of compatibility should:

- explain whether the civil penalty provisions should be considered to be 'criminal' for the purposes of human rights law, taking into account the criteria set out above; and
- if so, explain whether the provisions are consistent with the criminal process rights in articles 14 and 15 of the ICCPR, including providing justifications for any limitations of these rights.

It will not be necessary to provide such an assessment in the statement of compatibility on every occasion where proposed legislation includes civil penalty provisions or draws on existing civil penalty regimes. For example, it will generally not be necessary to provide such an assessment where the civil penalty provision is in a corporate or consumer protection context and the penalties are small.

Criminal process rights and civil penalty provisions

The key criminal process rights that have arisen in the committee's scrutiny of civil penalty provisions include the right to be presumed innocent (article 14(2)) and the right not to be tried twice for the same offence (article 14 (7)). For example:

- article 14(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) protects the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law. This requires that the case against the person be demonstrated on the criminal standard of proof, that is, it must be proven beyond reasonable doubt. The standard of proof applicable in civil penalty proceedings is the civil standard of proof, requiring proof on the balance of probabilities. In cases where a civil penalty is considered 'criminal', the statement of compatibility should explain how the application of the civil standard of proof for such proceedings is compatible with article 14(2) of the ICCPR.
- article 14(7) of the ICCPR provides that no-one is to be liable to be tried or punished again for an offence of which she or he has already been finally convicted or acquitted. If a civil penalty provision is considered to be 'criminal' and the related legislative scheme permits criminal proceedings to be brought against the person for substantially the same conduct, the statement of compatibility should explain how this is consistent with article 14(7) of the ICCPR.

Other criminal process guarantees in articles 14 and 15 may also be relevant to civil penalties that are viewed as 'criminal', and should be addressed in the statement of compatibility where appropriate.
