

First of all I would like to say thank you to all those people who have devoted their life and careers to public service.

Climate change requires everyone to do their bit, and not by halves. It is an extraordinary challenge. I doubt if we the human race have the guts to look in the mirror and admit we've done wrong.

Those guts, however, will be what are required if we are to have even the slightest chance of heading off disaster at the pass.

Speaking of guts, once we've owned up to the bad gas, we will have freed ourselves to adopt a new mentality. Freed ourselves to create a new mindset. A new way of looking at the world.

Carbon Dioxide will be the molecule that catalyses a transformation of this human race, from a scared predator seeking comfort in dominating it's environment, to a content, sentient, that exists in harmony and balance with it's environment.

The issue is not how can we make money from the production of carbon dioxide, but how can we reduce and eventually eliminate the production of carbon dioxide all together.

I trust that you understand the difference between eliminating carbon dioxide from the atmosphere and turning carbon dioxide into another commodity.

Name: Myles O'Keeffe